Having come to his abundant wealth by the lucky chance of a fine seam of coal in the bankrupt co-operative mine which he had doggedly taken on his own square shoulders, he came to it unprepared by training or even by anticipation; and now, with his hundreds of thousands, he was never more than the miner in his Sunday clothes, well brushed up, and with all the grime washed off, but with his heart in the skip and his interests on the bank. Naturally, however, he thought his money would do, if but little for himself, much for his son—more, indeed than it would. Seeing where it had landed this, and that, and t'other, he thought that he, too, had but to command, and the social forces would obey. But he did not take into consideration the difference between himself as represented by his son and those others who had brushed themselves up into passable imitations, if no art nor science ever yet discovered could make them the real thing. Miles was but Sly the tinker in my lord's best bed; and the freaks of fortune are no more really metamorphic than those of great men.

Unfortunately—or, perhaps, fortunately—who knows yet?—young Caleb had none of his father's not unnatural social ambition. Specially did he no wise share the old man's wishes about marrying blood and founding a family. Lady Elizabeth Inchbold, the all but dowerless daughter of the all but ruined Earl of Kingshouse, was the mark at which old Miles aimed the shaft of his desire. If Caleb could accomplish that, his father would settle well-nigh all his fortune on the young people, and would withdraw with his wife forever from the neighborhood. He would content himself with the knowledge of the fact. He would not seek to share in its glory, nor even to see the splendor of its rays. In the midst of the coarse-materialism of his nature lay this one little flower of love, this purest pearl of unselfishness. If Caleb would make himself the man he should be, and go in and win as he ought, he, and not Miles, should then be the millionaire—he, and not Miles should be the great man of the county and the commander of the future.

But Caleb would as soon have gone into a lion's den as into the Dower House, where the earl and countess and her family lived in secret penance and public pride. The castle was let to one Mr. Hermann Schmidt, a stock-broker who knew both how to spend his money like a prince and make a bargain like Shylock, and who was at once a generous friend and a dangerous man with whom to do business. Old Miles never made the smallest doubt but that Lady Elizabeth would accept the golden bait as eagerly as a hungry trout would take a May-fly. It was money that ruled the world, so far as he could see; and without being personally purse-proud, he had an exaggerated sense of its value.

He was a man of a coarse, ripe, Rabelaisian kind of humor, to whom nothing in the whole world was sacred or forbidden. He had no more faith in humanity than the most gloomy pessimist who thinks he saves his own soul by calling those of others—well—not saved. To him life was a jolly kind of comedy, where the fools were tricked and the wise men held their own and got more. He laughed, and was not offended at this lapse and that stumble. It was human nature when all was said and done, he would say; and that the "furred puss-cats" should scramble for the gold pieces—the stronger punching the heads of the weaker, and the weaker scratching slyly when they could not fight openly—that, too, he confessed and laughed at with the rest.

For himself, he knew what he wanted, and he meant to have it if he could get it. As he walked about the house and grounds, loud of voice, sturdy of limb, direct of intent, he was wont, as he expressed it, to make the feathers fly.

With his stolid, silent, and of late years, when she could no longer keep herself awake by active work, somnolent wife, old Miles was not so much roughly brutal as oppressive—coercing rather than tormenting, and not wishing in the least to torment. On the contrary, he meant to be kindly, and he was in truth as kindly as he knew how to be.

"She has been a good wife to me," he used to say when a little in his cups; "and what the (expletive) if I cannot make a lady of her, I'll not let her feel the differ."

It was the same with his son, whom he loved better than his life, but whom he now rated like a hound for his want of character and energy, and now cursed for a rebel if he dared to say his soul was his own and he thought he had the best right to it. But how can you get a free-spirited, high-mettled youth out of a creature belabored and bethrashed with words and whips as Caleb Stagg had ever been? From the day when he was a ten months' old baby in his mother's arms and made a wry face at his daddy's beer, up to now, when he was a grown man of six-and-twenty, and would not put himself forward to win the matrimonial blue ribbon his father made sure was within his reach, he had been hustled and hounded and rated and rasped—all for his own good, mind you!—and treated with no more human respect than if he had been a bit of wax, to be pinched and pulled and patted and posed as the modeller thought best.

Old Miles was vexed that he could not make the lad what he wanted him to be. He wished the boy to join the hunt and ride to hounds as a lad of spirit should. He should have the freshest bit of pink and the best horse to be seen at the cover-side, bar none, if he would. He wished him to learn how to dance, and to go to all the subscription balls. "Lord, mother! but it would be rare sport to see our Caleb a-hopping about the floor like a parched pea on a drum-head!" he would say to his wife Nancy with a loud guffaw, after he had sworn at his son till you thought you saw blue fire. He wanted him to be hand-in-glove with his great name and that big swell; to put himself forward and make a dash; there was money enow. And when Caleb, ever mindful of the fact that he had worked with his father in the mines up to the age of seventeen, when the coal was found, kept to his books and his microscope upstairs, and slunk sheepishly about the lanes afoot like a tramp, grubbing in the hedges for bugs or fishing for slime in the ponds, instead of capering here and there like a lord, with a groom at his heels and the money jingling in his pockets, old Miles used to have a turn at swearing and cursing that was like a fever fit or a bout of whooping-cough, as irrepressible and severe. Then, as a solatium, he would buy the lad a diamond pin or a set of studs, which Caleb would rather have been flayed alive than wear, and which he accepted with the painful smile that is in a man's face what tears are in a woman's.

This kind of treatment had the sole effect of making young Caleb devote himself yet more sedulously to the life he had chosen and the pursuits which delighted him—keeping out of his boisterous parent's way as much as he could, and abjuring with the dogged passivity of his kind the line laid down for him with so many sharp nails and so many hard knocks. Brought up as a rough mining lad for all his early life, at eighteen he had gone to a local college, after a year's private training at a clergyman's. But the grit of the coal dust, which he had breathed from his infancy, was never got out of him. His only happy hours were when he was watching the ways of bird or beast, spying out the secret arts of attack and defence of reptile and insect, or getting into the very workshop of Nature through the microscope. Add to this a close study of Shakspeare and the translated classics, and his list was complete. For of late years he had left off romping with the kitchen-maid in the hayloft, as had been his wont when younger and less developed—the stablemen keeping watch lest old Miles should come along and blow the whole place about their ears. But even now, a romp with the kitchen-maid would be preferable to making up to Lady Elizabeth Inchbold at the Dower House, for all that she had nothing of the aristocrat about her save her name, her traditions, her self-respect, and her grace.

"Thou'lt never do no good, Caleb," his father one day said to him, with an angry shrug of his stalwart shoulders. "What use have it been to waste all this brass on thy learning when thou'rt naught but a dommed fool at the end of it? Thy mother's no lady and thee's no gent; and hang me if the money had not better go to make a hospital for dead jackasses than to such lily-livered spenders as you two."

Miles had often said the same thing before; but to-day he emphasized his disapprobation with stronger intonation; impelled thereto by his vexation that Caleb had refused to accept an invitation to a garden-party at the vicarage—Mr. and Mrs. Stewart, the vicar and vicaress, being of that good and wholesome sort which likes to draw all society into the one golden net of kindly feeling, and therefore including young Caleb Stagg in their invitations.

A PERFECT ELDORADO.

The Land of Hidden Wealth Seems Near Port Arthur.

Richard R. Paulison, interested in pine and mineral lands, and President of the North Shore Mining Company, is now stopping at the Cadillac. Mr. Paulison has gleaned knowledge from experience in the mining regions of the west, and proposes hereafter to see the promised wealth which he seeks to develop. Hence it was that he explored the wilds referred to. His report shows a perfect Eldorado. "Beginning with the Beaver mine, about 30 miles west of Port Arthur, you strike a belt of silver 40 miles long and from four to six miles wide. The Beaver, purchased by Alger & Peters, is now owned by Alger & Hecker, Col. Hecker, of Detroit, having recently purchased the interest of Mr. Peters. I stopped off there, and they have a bonanza. There are eighty men at work and are doing nothing but developing the mine, sinking shafts and running levels, until their mill is completed. They now have a good half million in sight and will commence shipment in the spring. Only three quarters of a mile further west is the Badger mine, which is equally rich with the Beaver, and which is being developed on the same plan. I saw large specimens there of almost solid silver, just as it was taken from the mine. There are the two mines at either end of Silver Mountain. Their owners have spent $600,000 on the east one, and are prepared to spend as much more at the west end, for the inevitable returns will justify an outlay many times as great. We are developing a mine back of Grand Marias, and will get our fair proportion of the wondrous wealth imbedded in this silver belt. It may tax the credulity of the public to say that great masses of pure silver are found in the region I have been visiting, and through which I have been before, but such is the case. The rock of that bed is the oldest in the country, not excepting that of Mexico. What I mean is that it was brought to the surface by the earliest upheaval, and shows the richest ore in the world. There is bound to be a great boom there before 1890 is passed, and it will be a boom with ample capital behind it too, for a poor man stands no show under the strict mining laws of that country. One of its chief needs is a railroad, and that I propose to build. Canadians have the necessary franchise west from Port Arthur."—Detroit News.

An Interesting Love Story.

The London correspondent of the Manchester Guardian writes: I believe that the visit of the Prince of Wales to Mr. Murietta, at Wadhurst, is to be signalized by the formal announcement of Miss Murietta's engagement to Lord William Nevill. Lord William is a younger son of Lord Abergavenny, and a few years ago he shocked his father—who is the most virulent of Protestants—by becoming a Roman Catholic. The outraged parent promptly cut his erring son off with "the customary but insufficient shilling." The young man, much to his credit, immediately set to work on his own account, and joined a wine merchant's business, in which he has prospered so well that the firm now trades under the name of Hatch & Nevill. Lord William, who, besides being a consummate judge of the commodity he sells, is one of the best-looking and best-dressed young men in London, has now captivated the affections of a great heiress. The Muriettas are a family of Spanish merchants, and Mr. Murietta, with whom the Prince of Wales is staying, was lately ennobled under the title of Marquis of Santurce. He has bought Lord Granville's great house in Carlton House terrace. He has no son, and his daughter and heiress is to be Lady William Nevill.

A Queer Advertisement.

Here is a curiosity in the way of advertisements, extracted from a recent number of a religious journal:

DIVINE ORATIONS—NEWMAN GRACE, Literary Professor of Vital Philosophy, 43 St. George's street, Peckham, London, England, will write a sacred discourse (a beautiful piece of powerful eloquence) from any text, for any occasion and at any time, for the sum of one guinea, and he will undertake to sell no copy to any second person. All correspondence and transactions absolutely secret. [Psalms xix. chap., 14 verse.]

Those of my readers who do not happen to carry the nineteenth psalm in their minds will doubtless be pleased to see the text which the "Professor of Vital Philosophy" considers appropriate to his line of business: "Let the words of my mouth and the meditation of my heart be acceptable in Thy sight, O Lord, my strength and my Redeemer." If this sort of thing is vital philosophy it must also be something I have met with before under another name.—London Truth.

RED-NOSE MIKE'S CONFESSION.

His Account of the Terrible Crime in the Pennsylvannia Mountains.

A Wilkesbarre (Pa.) telegram says: At the hearing yesterday before Justice Rooney, Red-Nose Mike Rizello, the Italian charged with the murder of Paymaster McClure and Hugh Flanigan, was held without bail to answer the charge at the next sessions of the Criminal Court.

P. F. Quigley, the merchant of Miners' Mills, who at the suggestion of the Pinkertons became Mike's confidential friend and went his bail when he was first arrested, visited the prisoner at the County Jail yesterday afternoon and had a long talk with him. Mike broke down several times during the course of the conversation.

The following statement of the crime was made by the prisoner in the presence of a reporter:

"Well, I am in a bad box, but I hope everything will come out all right. Greed for money led me to commit this crime. When you saw me in your store on the morning of Friday, October 19th, I was there for a bad purpose. I was waiting for Paymaster McClure. About the time I thought he was due from Wilkesbarre I left the store and started up the road. When I got near the Whitehouse road where you turn off to the shanties I heard McClure's horse coming behind me. I did not look back. I was then about one hundred yards from the ambush where my accomplices were stationed. When McClure and Flanigan came up to me, McClure shouted: 'Hello, Mike!' I replied, 'Good morning.'

"As soon as the carriage passed me I walked fast and kept right behind them, although the occupants of the buggy paid no attention to me. When we reached the place where my accomplices were I pulled out my revolver.

"Before I could fire Bevinneo, who was an expert marksman, fired at McClure and he fell out of the vehicle. His foot caught and he was dragged. Then I fired four shots from the rear and Villella, who was standing behind a stump on the opposite side of the road from the blacksmith, then fired at Flannigan and he fell out of the carriage. The horse started to run up the road and I thought he would make his way to the railroad before we could stop him and get the money. Villello got scared when the first shots were fired and ran through the woods to the shanty. Bevinneo was a good runner. He ran after the horse and caught him about two hundred yards up the road. He shot the animal in the head. We then cut the strap that held the valise to the buggy and made our way through the woods to the shanties. I did not see McFadden. McClure and Flanigan must have seen the other two men as they stepped out in the road; you know the men, Quigley; because you remember one day they started to quarrel with you when you were buying some cabbage from a man in front of your store.

"Supt. McQuion was right when he accused me of the murder that evening. Bevinneo and Villello are now in Italy."

EXPERIMENTAL TORTURING.

Practical Experiments on the Punishments of the Middle Ages.

A New York telegram says: A judgment for $61 was entered on Tuesday in favor of Emile Leclair and against John M. Badollet in the First Division Court. Leclair says he was employed by Badollet to go through various tortures, so that a record could be kept of his suffering for the benefit of an eccentric resident of Boston, who is writing a book on the punishments inflicted during the middle ages. After submitting to one torture he announced that he had had enough and that he would never consent to be experimented upon again. Badollet then told him that he could change from the tortured one to the torturer. This new work was much more to his taste, and for several months he did his best to make his employer suffer and assisted him in taking notes.

When Leclair left Badollet he was unable to collect the wages due him and he began a suit through Counsellor Louis Mathot. Just before the case came to trial Badollet induced Leclair to agree to a compromise, but as he did not pay any money the lawyer thought it would be best to obtain judgment. When the case came up before Civil Justice Michael Norton, Leclair went on the witness stand and proved the amount of his claim. He described his duties with Badollet as cook, typewriter and model. Upon this formal testimony, as no defence was interposed, judgment was granted, and it was immediately placed in the hands of a marshal for collection.

Suffered in Silence for His Brother.

A Stillwater, Minn., despatch says: There was released from State prison the other day, on pardon from the Governor, a man who suffered disgrace and imprisonment for over ten years, for a crime of which he was not only innocent, but which he actively tried to prevent. The victim is Jacob Bird, who, when 18 years old, was convicted in Dakota county of murder and sentenced to the State prison for life. The executive document granting the pardon states: "It appears from the affidavits of J. N. Castle, an attorney in the case, and Stephen Newell, then Sheriff of Dakota county, that the crime was committed by Jacob's brother John, who died in jail before trial, and that the prisoner, Jacob, had not even assisted in committing the crime, and was opposed to it." Jacob never made any attempt to implicate his brother.

TERROR, SUFFERING AND DEATH.

Father and Son Pass a Dreadful Night on the Ice—Death of the Old Man.

A Trenton despatch says: On Wednesday night during the violent storm the shanty of Peter Blakely, fisherman, was carried away. It was located below Baker's Island. Mr. Blakely and his son being homeless started for Trenton, but in consequence of the terrible gale they wandered about all night on the ice. In the morning they were discovered by farmers, who found them lying together on the cold ice, the father dead and the boy almost exhausted. The Whig correspondent hurried to the scene, found the youth in a farm house, where he was being restored, and was given the following account of the terrible exposure he endured: "Father and I had been fishing in the bay all winter. And when the ice began to get rotten we moved our fish house on shore, below Snake Island. Part of the shanty was on shore. Myself and father went to bed last night, and some time afterwards the shanty was carried out on the bay, and the first thing we knew we were half a mile from shore. The sea was breaking all around us. We got out of the shanty, and found ourselves on a large cake of ice going down the bay. We shouted, but found no answer. We could see nothing. The ice floe was firmly jammed, and we remained on it all night, praying for daylight. Towards morning father seemed to be getting weaker. When the long-looked for daylight came we found we were only fifty yards from shore. I spoke to father, but he made no answer. I went ashore, found a fisherman, told him my position, and he refused to come and help me. He thought we would all be drowned. I then went back to father, but he did not move, so I tried to carry him ashore myself, but I could not. I then tore the lining out of my cap and covered his face and went ashore again. At this time I was very weak, and was fast losing my strength. At last I got on the shore and told some farmers about father, and they fetched him ashore and left him lying on the ground until they went five miles, to Trenton, to inform the police. I think if they had taken father to one of the houses and attended to him in place of leaving him in the cold, he might have been brought around. I never passed through such a time in my life. Father prayed nearly all the time when we were on the ice. I am feeling very sure now I shall never forget the 9th and 10th of January, 1889."

BEATEN TO DEATH.

A French Canadian Fatally Assaulted by Flesherton Toughs.

A last (Wednesday) night's Orillia despatch says: Yesterday, when the afternoon train from Midland drew into the station here, among other passengers who alighted were Charles Hebner, his brother and a French Canadian named Philip Morriel. They made their way up town, Morriel stopping at the Oriental Hotel. In the evening the Hebners came around with the intention, according to their threats, of giving the Frenchman a thrashing, but they were promptly expelled by the proprietor of the hotel. The train left at 9 o'clock, all being aboard and somewhat the worse of liquor. Arriving at Flesherton, about sixteen miles north of here, their place of residence, they alighted. The train had hardly moved out when the Hebners attacked Morriel, Charles knocking him down with a pair of skates he had strapped together. A man named Thomas Cartmill, who witnessed the affair, tried to interfere and was also knocked down, but was only slightly hurt. The Hebners kicked Morriel's face and body almost into a jelly and left him for dead. In a few minutes, however, he arose and walked to his boarding house, about a quarter of a mile distant. He told them that "the Hebners had been trying to murder him, but they couldn't kill a Frenchman." Dr. Hanley, of Waubaushene, was immediately sent for, but arrived only a few minutes before Morriel died—about four hours after he had been beaten. The Hebners were arrested and brought to the Ryan House, Coldwater. An inquest is being held on the body of the deceased. The Hebners bear a hard name here, Charles having lost an arm in the Central Prison while serving a term there. Morriel seemed to be a quiet fellow, and had been working on the farm of Mr. Scarrow. He has a brother and sister in Quebec, who have been telegraphed to. It is rumored that there is a woman at the bottom of the affair.

MAN'S DUPLICITY.

George Algernon Jefferson Anderson Missing With His Wife's Money.

A Brockville despatch says: Some time during the forepart of December last Geo. Algernon Jefferson Anderson arrived in Dundela and was engaged in writing records in family Bibles. He was an excellent chirographer and was liberally patronized by the people in the vicinity. He boarded in the same house in which the school mistress stayed, and as he was of rather prepossessing appearance she soon became enamored of him. He professed to reciprocate her affection and an engagement soon followed. She lent him $25 to pay his fare to Morrisburg, to purchase some clothes. He returned and they were married at Bell's Corners on Dec. 22nd. They afterwards visited Morrisburg, where she drew $100 of her savings from the bank, and gave them to George Algernon, to secure a house in Brockville in which to take up there abode. She had business in Ottawa, and after spending a couple of days of married life, they separated, she going to Ottawa and he coming to Brockville to secure a house. On Saturday last she arrived in Brockville and since then she has been looking for her truant husband, George Algernon Jefferson Anderson, but he with the imposing name has left for parts unknown. GLORY OF THE GIRL.

She is a Thing of Beauty and we Love Her from the Cradle to the Grave.

(Ebullition in the New York Herald.)

All things through thee take nobler form
And look beyond the earth;
The mill-round of our fate appears
A sun path in thy worth.
—Emerson.

In the animal race exists a fine, fair thing, so great, so requisite for our needs, that if she vanished like a star, the sun, the moon and all men would follow.

The roses could not grow if she should die; the smell of clover could not blow if she were not; the sound of tong could not ascend if she won't live, and gloom and death, you see, would be among us.

I refer to the girl.

The girl's first breath is promise, the girl's first step's a blessing, the girl's first word's a symphony, the girl's last word means business. Her rattle is melody, her prattle is poetry, her bibs and tuckers hung on a line are dainty delights and deliriums.

Let every female thing on earth sing pæans of victory! Let them elevate their plumage in the pure, precious pride that, if they wither whence, their consort—man—is down in the depths of the gilded tureen.

HERE'S A DAISY BABY!

Coming down the sunny walk in short, white dresslets, snubby nosed, pink, wide eyed, cooing, the feminine babe is best. The mystical charm of the sex of the thing is so undeniably sweet! Ask the nurse—the bright, slender, palpably feminine nurse—if the bundle is a girl. If she says it's a girl then kiss her for luck, for her mother, for joy, for future content.

Don't make a mistake and kiss the nurse.

On her way to the school in the primness of youth the little girl student is best. The coy, gentle gaze, the faint, timid smile are so indescribably pure. Like a reed, like a rose, like a song, like a star, she bends, glows, sighs and beams. And the faith in her heart and the maid by her side know their business and keep her from harm.

Pretty soon after this she makes her debut.

In soft, fluffy muslin and crepe de Chine the feminine rosebud is best. Her gurgling laugh and her big wondering eyes are an elegant first stock in trade. The curve of her neck would surprise Mickey Welch and a lily would envy her arms. It is new—in the bud, with the leaves still tight curled that the girl takes the last crumb of feeling. It is now—like a gawk, like two yards of wood—that the youth sneaks around and is moony.

And why?

Because the sweet femininess of the arrangement is getting in its fine work.

At the altar, with joy bells a ringing and organs a pealing their blessings, the girl is the best; she's as white as the blossoms that wreathe in her hair, as the faint breath of lace that enshrouds her fair head, as the neck of a swan, as snow. The man in his black is in sight, to be sure, but do you think that he really is "in it?" Is the sigh of the man or the sigh of the girl the sigh that seems sacred and lovely? Is the "Yes" of the man or the "Yes" of the bride the "Yes" that rings down the far future?

Well, you get down into the future and listen.

And now to the night when they spring an alarm and the doctor's three miles to windward—when the house is all hustle and bustle and whizz, and it all seems so strange and so sweet and so new; when a faint little cry creeps down from upstairs, is not masculineness ashamed at its weak, helpless part—is not everything great and divine and sublime contained in the musical tidings—

"Another girl!"

I do not celebrate here the mere female. Look at some of them, and you'll know why. But pick out the real elegance of feminineism—The Girl—and the song sings itself.

A LOVE TRAGEDY.

Bloody Duel Over the Hand of a Young Quebec Lady—Tragic Termination to the Bout.

A Montreal despatch says: A bloodthirsty and barbarous duel has been fought near Louisville, Que. Two young men named Charpentier and Frechette were aspirants for the hand of one Mlle. Chimen, and they were not long in finding a pretext for a quarrel, which came to a tragic ending on Thursday. They met and in the most cold blooded manner arranged between themselves to settle the matter by a duel, the conditions of which were unique and barbarous. Seconds were dispensed with, and both men were to go to a certain point on the river bank at a given hour and there to fight with any weapon which came to hand, firearms or cutting weapons to be excluded, until one of them was killed or insensible, when the survivor was to throw his body into the river. Both men kept the appointment, and the battle lasted about ten minutes, both the men using their fists at first, after which they took to stones, and the end came when Charpentier's skull was crushed in by a blow from an iron bar which Frechette picked up. The final condition of throwing the body into the river was not complied with, the victor driving off in his waggon. He has not been heard of since, it being supposed he has escaped to the United States. It was impossible to cut off his flight, as the telegraph wires were rendered useless by the storm. Charpentier was found insensible, and the doctors say he cannot live. Mlle. Chimen, the cause of the quarrel, has been out of her mind since the tragic affair.

—There is no foundation for the report that Rev. Charles Chiniquy has retired, or that he intends to retire from active work. He resigned his charge at St. Anne, Kankakee county, Illinois, to facilitate the union of the two Presbyterian congregations there; but he is as active as ever, and will continue his evangelical work as long as health and strength are granted to him. He does not covet otium cum dignitate, and would far rather wear out than rust out. He is now in his 80th year, having been born on 30th July, 1809.

Old boots and shoes, steamed to a pulp, are now converted into the soft, stamped, ornamental leather so popular for artistic bookbinding.

HIS OWN CALENDAR.

A Birth-mark that Waxes and Wanes with the Moon Itself.

Twenty-eight years ago when Mrs. Sarah Rothermal gave birth to a son there was a mark upon the back part of the infant's head just below and to the right of the base of the brain. The parents were not superstitious, and not a great deal of attention was then paid to the defect in the child's head. To-day he is widely known, and the birth-mark upon James Rothermal is the most remarkable freak in nature yet heard of in this section of the country. The man is a carpenter by trade, and lives in Springhill township, close to where the Cheat River empties into the Monongahela. He is more than ordinarily intelligent. Mr. Rothermal's birth-mark is not of the common kind, and its transformation with the changing of the moon makes it particularly peculiar. It is naturally crescent in shape and bluish in color. As the moon is turning the first quarter the mark becomes a reddish hue, and the swelling of the flesh below it, extending diagonally across the neck to the right shoulder, is perceptible. The mark becomes redder as the moon grows older, and the flesh swells correspondingly. As the birthmark grows large as the moon becomes full, so it decreases in size as the moon wanes, and when the moon is quite dark there is nothing to be seen but the bluish, crescent-shaped mark. Singular as it may appear, these changes have come regularly ever since the man was born. Mr. Rothermal suffers no inconvenience by the enlargement of the neck, nor does he endure much pain. He needs no almanac to tell the changes of the moon, simply placing his hand on the mark to tell its condition. While going to school the scholars and teacher often observed the changes in the birthmark and wondered at the remarkable regularity with which they occurred. There are many theories discussed by Mr. Rothermal's acquaintances as to the relation of the moon to animal life, but none has been advanced which is satisfactory to every one. All agree, however, that the freak can go on record as the strangest thus far observed.—Connellsville (Pa.) correspondence New York Times.

Cheap Living in Japan.

If Frank G. Carpenter, whose letters from the orient have been attracting some attention, is to be believed, wages are relatively higher in Japan than in Chicago. At Tokio, according to Mr. Carpenter, skilled workmen command from 30 cents a day upward, while salesmen receive from $15 to $30 per month. As this is in a country where "food is about $2 25 a month for each person" and the "necessary outlay for clothing about $3 75 per year," while a one-room house may be had for "40 cents a month in American money," it is pretty clear that the Chinese are not altogether unwise in flowing thither. It will be observed that rent in Tokio is about one-thirtieth of a mechanic's wages, food about one-fifth and clothing less than one-fortieth. There is probably no carpenter, or printer, or tailor, or iron-worker in Chicago, averaging $2 a day, who is getting rent for a thirtieth of his wages, or $2 per month. He may get his food for somewhat less than one-seventh of his wages, but his clothing certainly costs him more than one-fortieth. Mr. Carpenter's figures are perhaps open to some question, particularly as to the cost of food, which is very high relatively, but in any case they seem to show that the Japanese workman is retaining a somewhat greater proportion of his product than is left to the American workman after he has paid rent and taxes.

The Paradoxes of Science.

The water which drowns us, a fluent stream, can be walked upon as ice. The bullet, which, when fired from a musket, carries death, will be harmless if ground to dust before being fired. The crystallised part of the oil of roses, so grateful in its fragrance—a solid at ordinary temperatures, though readily volatile—is a compound substance, containing exactly the same elements, and in exactly the same proportions, as the gas with which we light our streets. The tea which we daily drink, with benefit and pleasure, produces palpitations, nervous tremblings, and even paralysis, if taken in excess; yet the peculiar organic agent called theine, to which tea owes its qualities, may be taken by itself as theine, not as tea, without any appreciable effect. The water which will allay our burning thirst augments it when congealed into snow; so that it is stated by explorers of the Arctic regions that the natives "prefer enduring the utmost extremity of thirst rather than attempt to remove it by eating snow." Yet if the snow be melted it becomes drinkable water. Nevertheless, although if melted before entering the mouth, it assuages thirst like other water; when melted in the mouth it has the opposite effect. To render this paradox more striking, we have only to remember that ice, which melts more slowly in the mouth, is very efficient in allaying thirst.

And He Still Has Hope.

"I have been shipwrecked, been baked in a railroad accident and fired out of a foundry window by a boiler explosion. I was shot in the neck at Gettysburg, suffered starvation in Libby Prison, fell overboard from a transport off Charleston and left four of my fingers in the mouth of a shark. I had my right arm broken in two places in a New York riot, and stood on a barrel with a halter round my neck in a southern town at the outbreak of the great rebellion from sunrise to sunset. I was buried under the ruins of a building in San Francisco during an earthquake, and dug out after fifty hours of imprisonment. I have been shot at three times, twice by lunatics and once by a highwayman. I was buried two days by a gas explosion in a mine, and narrowly escaped lynching last year in Arizona through mistaken identity. And though I am over 50, and have nearly lost the use of my right leg, have just had, as I understand, all my property, on which there was no insurance, destroyed by fire in a western town; and the doctor in New York to whom I went last week for an examination assures me that I will soon be bedridden from rheumatism; nevertheless,' he added cheerfully, "while I undoubtedly have met some obstacles in the past, I still refuse to believe that luck is against me."—Daylight Land.

The Advance is right on the cowcatcher as an advertising medium. Messrs. Bro. Fawcett, of Streetsville, has taken up the study of Indian. He gives us this startling information: "Nidi pah na wa ne pun ne ze, ah shum me shun O buh nah waune." Still we do not quite agree with him. You see the Oh no hang, let's not see is not [illegible] neah-aha neah washkosh. Consequently we think Bro. Fawcett's no chear nocka quem is somewhat non meliner she bashel. Wah?

Rev. Mr. Enns, a this years graduate of Knox College, occupied the Presbyterian pulpit here on Sabbath last. Mr. Enns is a very promising young man, and preached a most excellent sermon from Romans ten and thirteen. "For whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved." His discourse was of more than ordinary excellence, and would lead one to expect that with experience and practice he may become a power in his church.

Social.

A parlor social was held on Friday evening last at the Methodist parsonage, which Rev. Mr. Shilton had kindly thrown open for the occasion. The rooms were crowded with a merry company. Games, vocal and instrumental music, etc., constituted the program. Old and young vied with each other in making the evening pass pleasantly and succeeded remarkably well. It was one of the most successful affairs of the season, over $16 being added to the Ladies' Aid Society funds.

Mr. John Martin, of Owen Sound, brightened our sanctum with his genial presence on Friday. Mr. Martin is an old friend of the editor's and "greased his wheels" to the extent of two dollars. May John continue to grow even more portly and jolly on the good things of this life.

At the County Council in Owen Sound last week Mr. John Rutherford was appointed to the County clerkship, made vacant by the death of Mr. Gale. R. McNaught, reeve of Sarwak, was given the wardenship. Mr. Edward Rorke was appointed as auditor by the Council after a warm tussle. Mr. Edgar is the second auditor.

Owing to a misunderstanding there was no mechanics' institute meeting held on Monday evening. There will be another one called, of which due notice will be given. We are sure that when the people understand the Government's liberality in such matters they will wonder why advantage was not taken of it long ago.

An interesting debate took place in the County council last week on a by-law regulating the width of vehicles to be used on various public roads in the county. The by-law had been passed through two readings at the December session and was to be laid before their constituents at the various municipal nominations by the candidates for council. The expression of the people thus given some being reported to be quite enthusiastic for the passing of the by-law, while the opposite view was strongly endorsed by some, especially by the ratepayers of Euphrasia. The by law was on division—20 to 19—ordered to become law.—O. S. Times.

In connection with this discussion Mr. Gamey, the able reeve of Osprey, tells us of a biting piece of sarcasm on the part of some member of Council. A strong protest came from Euphrasia against the by-law. The aforementioned funny member suggested that a by-law be passed making it necessary for people to run sleighs in that township on one runner. The full force of this sarcasm is understood when it is known that Euphrasia runs narrower sleighs than any of the surrounding townships.

Occupied at Last.

The new C.P.R. station here has been completed for some weeks, but it was not until Thursday last that it received its new occupants. Friends McGill and Harrington feel so large and self-satisfied now that they are continually wondering how they ever existed in the cramped condition occupied by them during the past nine months. There is an important air about their every action now, and we share their pride. The new station is a credit to our town.

An Army Dance.

A Flesherton gentleman had occasion to visit Creemore last week, and remained over night at Dunedin, about five miles this side of Creemore. He tells of some Salvation Army lassies at the hotel where he stopped. A large number of the Army had came out from Creemore to hold religious service, but one portion of them prefered enjoying a dance and so the company split up, one half holding their prayer meeting and the other half engaging a room at the hotel, where they danced until then brethern were prepared to return home, or rather until the landlord ordered them to cease their lascivious orgies, when they skipped out. The gentleman's veracity is beyond dispute and he says he saw them with his own eyes dancing in their Army uniform at the hotel where he was stopping. What kind of strangers is thy tent pitched among, Brother Spurr? We mourn for thee.

Death of Mrs. Hooper.

Death has claimed another soul who, in life, was well known in this village and surrounding country. Mrs. Richard Hooper passed away on Thursday last after a weary fight with the fangs of consumption. The deceased was a young woman, only 30 years of age, daughter of James Myles, Esq., and was respected and honored by every one who knew her. She was a playmate of the editor's boyhood, and it is with extreme sorrow that we chronicle her early demise. A sunny and affable nature and a heart overflowing with kindness, were the notable features of a life which has been stricken down in the bloom of womanhood. Last August she returned home from far off Kansas where she had been living with her husband, and where she contracted the disease. Since then she has been living at her father's residence, near Kimberley, cared for by loving hands, and receiving all assistance in the physician's power, but to no avail. Her remains were interred in the cemetery at Meaford on Saturday. Mr. Hooper and the sorrowing relations have the sympathy of many friends.

For the Advance.

The "Party."

How we love the social party, with its jolly little plays,
Where the clothes-pin is important and the button holds our gaze,
Where the bean bag, game of Authors and the black-eyed dominoes
Take the place of ball-room dresses and the tread of dainty toes.

There is something quite exciting in the forfeit paying scheme,
Where the tape is measured off and all is like a blessed dream
Yet the dream is sometimes shattered, and your fun is made to pall
When you're asked to stand upon your head beside the parlor wall;

Or when you must salute a maid or council with yourself,
While your best girl sits there pouting—the desperation of.
Now of course those things are drawbacks, as we learned when quite a boy
That we've got to have some sorrows mixed in every blissful joy.

Still I say give me the social winter party with its fun
Where the lads and lasses gather when the day is done,
And where cupid ever busy, revels free from fray
All unnoticed by his victims [illegible]

Beautiful sleighing now, and business brisk.

A Rosebud Immortal.

The following is from a book of poems, "A Haunted Heart," by Minna Irving, of Tarrytown, whose quarrel with Stenographer Palmer Wells has excited the attention of the courts and the newspapers

We stood in the garden at morning,
A garden all golden and green;
The leaves in the wind sang together,
Her laughter made music between
She was robed in the white of the lilies,
Her eyes, like the heavens, were blue,
And around her, in sweetness unfolded,
The roses a-glitter with dew.

I prayed for a bud, and she gave it,
With a smile and a blush and a sigh.
I caught and I kissed her white fingers,
There rebuked a tear in her eye.
The gardener, ancient and wrinkled,
Came clipping the boxwood and yew,
And she went, and a cloud drifted over,
And the sparkle died out of the dew.

My locks are a glimmer with silver,
My life is unbrightened by love,
For, still in the robes of the lilies,
She sings with the angels above.
In a book in my hand it the attic,
Laid in with a leaflet of rue,
Is a rosebud that never unfolded
For lack of the sunlight and dew.

That shall she is dead like the rosebud,
And my love for her never was told,
But in my dream of the glory of heaven
Is of her at the gateway of gold.
She stands with her feet in the blossoms,
And waiteth to welcome me through,
And give me a rosebud immortal,
Besprred over with diamonds of dew.

ESTELLE'S INFATUATION:
A NOVEL.

"You know, father, that I do not care for these parties," said Caleb, awkwardly. "They are not in my line, and I am never my own man in them."

"And thee doesn't make account of thy duty to me as brought thee up," said Miles. "What thy father wishes doesn't weigh so much as the tail-end of a mouse with thee. Thy father who has slaved for thee, and thought night and day of naught but thee and what would be for thy good—thou'st naught better to do than flout and fleer when he wants thee to hold up thy head as thou shouldst with the best."

"You know, father, I never mean to flout or fleer you," said Caleb, earnestly; "but I do not feel called on to go about among these people. They think themselves of another make of flesh and blood from us, and they don't care a jot for our money—got, as it were, by a fluke, and with such owners as we."

"Such owners as we! and what the dickens dost mean by that, jackanapes?" shouted Miles.

"Why, just this, father: we are not gentlemen and we can't pretend that we are," said Caleb.

"Toots, toots, lad! Brass'll gild a miner's pick till it is as fine as my lord's sword," said Miles, half in fun and half in anger. The gentry at Kingshouse ain't far different from men and women elsewhere, I reckon; and a full purse goes as far, my lad, as those mouldy old coats of arms, with nothing behind them but lean chaps and family pride. Go thy ways, I tell thee. Hie up stairs, Caleb, like a good lad, and do as thy father bids. Don thy best coat and go to the vicarage with the rest. And if thou'lt bring me home a well-doing likely daughter-in-law, like that Lady Elizabeth yonder, I'd not care to call the King my uncle. And I'd set thee up in housekeeping so that the King shouldn't be put about to call thee nephew."

Caleb still hesitated—silent, awkward, reluctant, abashed; when his father suddenly flew into a rage such as even he was not accustomed to see; and with curses, kicks, blows, and oaths offered him his choice—to go, or to leave the house that very moment disinherited forever. His son had therefore nothing for it but to bend before the storm, and yield to his father's desire, and so it was that for the first time in his life he formed one of the Kingshouse gatherings, and made his entrance into the fair company of whom Lady Elizabeth Inchbold was the queen and Estelle Clanricarde the star of beauty.

CHAPTER III.

HIS IPHIGENIA.

One of old Miles Stagg's favorite aphorisms was that which proclaims how fine birds are made by fine feathers. Give Colin Clout a good coat, a flashy necktie, a gold chain as thick as a ship's rope, studs as big as sixpences, and all the rest to correspond, and Miles could see no difference between his appearance and that of the smartest young Jemmy Jessamy in the land. If Jemmy were to be dressed in flannels, the difference, indeed, would be to the good of Colin. Consequently, though Caleb, from his experience of college life, knew slightly better than his father, and from his more delicately organized brain, had at all times keener and quicker perceptions, he was forced to obey the old man's imperative command that he should make himself as smart as ninepence, and take the shine out of that gang of genteel paupers he would meet in the vicarage gardens to day.

His close fitting frock-coat was new to rawness and distractingly faultless; his black trousers were still in the tailor's well-defined creases; his glossy hat shone like a blackened mirror; and his jewelry was resplendent. Over the edge of his stiff white collar, guillotined with an aniline crimson tie fastened by a large diamond horse-shoe pin, his round, flat, unmeaning face rose like a pug-dog's changed from black to red and white, and from hairy caninity into a fairly good sketch of humanity. His fawn-colored gloves matched the color of his hair, and his patent-leather boots crippled the flat feet which, for the most part, expatiated in greased boots where his corns were not tortured. Such as he was, holding himself as stiffly as if trussed beneath his clothes, shy, sheepish, uncomfortable, self-conscious, and not a whit reassured by his father's boisterous commendation, nor by his mother's vacant smile, the young man mounted the dog-cart, which the coachman drove—the smart groom sitting behind, his arms folded and his tongue in his cheek and went off to one of those informal tennis parties which Mr. and Mrs. Stewart gave weekly for the pleasure of the young people and the promotion of social good feeling.

It need hardly be said what impression the poor young man made when he came on the lawn, somewhat after time because of the struggle at home; his wonderful get-up contrasting so sharply with the loose flannels of the rest, the tightly buckled belts, the turned-up sleeves, the well-worn cricket shoes, and all the other loose points of the time and occasion. Not the dear good vicaress herself could resist that little smile which comes unbidden on the first flush of a ridiculous surprise, while some of the worse bred and less kindly tittered audibly. Lord Eustace, Lady Elizabeth's younger brother, gave a slight whistle, which was the rudest thing of all. But then he was a lord, and entitled to his own private code. Charlie Osborne, who, as poet, painter, musician and artist generally, assumed to know more about the religion of beauty and the morality of æsthetics than any one else, looked at the new-comer with the same expression on his face as if a false chord had been played, a halting rhyme repeated, or a man been detected hiding the ace up his sleeve.

As for Caleb himself, if that old familiar wish about the earth opening and swallowing him up alive could have been fulfilled for his benefit, how gladly would he have sunk beneath the sod, never to reappear! His distress was so apparent, his awkwardness so pitiful, his whole bearing so abject and humiliated, that three charitable souls took him into the sacred precincts of their compassion, and forgot to ridicule for the sake of pity. One of these three was, of course, Mrs. Stewart herself—a woman of that liberal, kindly, but not sentimental nature sometimes found in the arid wastes of society, as might be found a fountain and a palm tree in the desert; the second, Estelle, who thought how dreadful it must be to be like that; and third was Lady Elizabeth Inchbold, the fair-set mark at which old Miles aimed the presumptuous shaft of his paternal desires.

But then this was Lady Elizabeth's way. Whatever there was of hurt or sorrow, of low-lying, trampled on, helpless or mishandled, Lady Elizabeth was willing to lift up and comfort. Could she have wiped away all tears from all eyes at the cost of her own eternal weeping, she would have done so; could she have healed all wounds by the blood of her own heart, she would have healed them. No thought of self, no calculation of the extent or cost of her sacrifice troubled the pure stream of her human pity. That she should besmirch herself by touching the besmirched never occurred to her as possible. And if it had? Well, those who give themselves up to the care of the lepers doom themselves to the disease they live to soothe and die to lessen.

Estelle Clanricarde's great friend, she and Charlie Osborne, whom Estelle loved, stood at the opposite sides of that great triangle of life and thought the apex of which is truth. Where he, bitten by the sentimental cynicism of a certain school, despised his kind, and held life but a blotch and a blunder—more especially modern life and all the changes wrought by steam and science—she saw good everywhere, and like those who bore for underground waters on a sandy tract, knew how to find the deeper beauties hidden beneath superficial ugliness. For her, unselfish, generous, glad to serve and eager to save were more harmonies than discords in this great diapason of suffering and joy, of vice and virtue; for him, self-indulgent to pleasure and weak to pain, unable to bear, of irritable fibre all through, were mainly discords, with here and there a harmony in a gorgeous sunset or finely worded objurgation of the high-priest of his own restricted sect, or in Estelle Clanricarde when he could get her to himself and forget his artificial pessimism in the light of her dear eyes. Lady Elizabeth had sympathy with humanity because she did not lose touch of the real in the ideal. She therefore loved mankind, and pitied as much as she loved. Charlie Osborne refused sympathy because of his abhorrence for that which was mean and low and ugly in man. Her love went to people, his to things; hers to facts, his to thoughts. Between them lay the whole difference between the two great schools of humanism and realism—humanity and art.

It was not, then, out of the usual ordering of things, but the reverse, that when her grave, calm eyes had taken the whole circumstances of this unhappy omad'haun, so painfully out of place, Lady Elizabeth should go to where Mrs. Stewart was still talking to him in her brisk bee like manner, and join in the conversation as one who had the right of previous knowledge. She had that way. Her manner was that of one who had already established a claim of sympathy, and counted the points of contact. She never stood on the defensive, as even well-bred people are wont to do with strangers, but assumed from the first that touch of nature which makes the whole world kin.

"By Jove! that sister of mine is stark, staring mad. Look at her talking to that Polichinelle!" said Lord Eustace, not below his breath, to Estelle, to whom he was paying exaggerated court to take a rise out of Charlie Osborne, for mischief, not malice.

"On the contrary, I think she is very sweet to be so kind to such an object. But then she always is so kind," returned Estelle, glad to be able to contradict her adhesive companion, whom she could not shake off, and wished anywhere but where he was.

She knew Charlie's susceptible jealousy and faculty for self-tormenting, and she had no wish to vex him for Lord Eustace's pleasure. She was far too gentle and sweet-natured to wish to vex him for her own—just to see the power she had over him—as is the way with certain of her sex.

"Are you, too, one of the new sort?" asked Lord Eustace contemptuously. "I thank my good stars I am out of it. All this playing at democracy seems to me not only the worst form but the vilest rot afloat. It is rank atheism to pretend that we have no distinction of classes, and that gentlemen and boors are own brothers. And only owls are atheists."

"All the same, I think Lady Elizabeth is very sweet to go and talk to that dreadful creature," said Estelle, with her pretty doggedness.

And then—her mother's back being conveniently turned at the moment—she looked round to Charlie Osborne, and sent him a telegraphic message with her eyes which allayed some of the fever burning in his veins.

Meanwhile Lady Elizabeth took it in hand to make poor Caleb's present torture a little less unendurable. She found it hard work. There was not a solecism that he did not commit, not a gaucherie that he left untouched. He called her Miss to start with, and when Mrs. Stewart gave her her title formally, he made "Lady Elizabeth" flank every sentence, now before, now behind and sometimes fore and aft together.

When Mrs. Stewart said, "I don't think you know many people here, Mr. Stagg?" poor Caleb blushed like a peony and looked like a fool.

"No, Mrs. Stewart, not to speak to," he answered.

Then, when she presented him to Lady Elizabeth, he forgot his hat, and shook hands instead. When, pointing to the garden seat near to where they were standing, Lady Elizabeth said, "Shall we sit down," he planted himself at once on the edge in the shade, and let her sit in the sun with the light in her eyes. When he saw his mistake he was too awkward to get up and rectify it, though he would have let her walk over his body and use his fine new clothes for a door-mat had she had the mind. And when she, with that wonderful insight which belonged to her, divining the cause of his apparent discourtesy, and knowing that the little sacrifice would be his pleasure, said quietly, "I am sure your eyes are stronger than mine, Mr. Stagg; would you mind changing places with me?" he very nearly tumbled head-foremost into her lap in his eagerness to obey her, and wiped the place where he had been sitting with his handkerchief for her benefit.

But by slow degrees he ceased to twirl his hat between his knees; his heart left off beating in those painful gasps which are more like sobs than beats; those invisible needles ceased to prick him, as they had been pricking him ever since he drove up to the gates; he got to feel that he knew this Lady Elizabeth, this daughter of the earl, quite well, though not intimately—as one would know one's guardian angel, say; something to revere, but not to be afraid of; while over all his being stole a divine sense of calm, as with a lost wanderer when he sees the welcome light of a human home.

After probing and ploughing this barren tract and that arid acre, Lady Elizabeth at last fell on Caleb's own particular subject—flowers and birds and natural history generally. It needed patience and good engineering to draw from the poor omad'haun the fact that he knew anything at all; but the "delight," as her father sometimes called her who had him in hand, was both patient and a good conversational engineer; and though her shy and awkward naturalist never ventured on a positive assertion, but said what he had to say with a modest "I think" as the grating behind which his knowledge took refuge, even to "thinking" that field-mice eat honey-bees, and that the sundew entraps flies—she got a great deal out of him that was pleasant and new, and that made her uphill grind a little less arduous.

Also it somewhat tightened the slack cords of his own self-esteem to find that I could interest her by what he said. How glad he was that she cared for nature and things? He was indemnified now for all the ridicule and coarse opposition his student's tastes had had to face and bear at home. This divine creature, who reminded him of, some Greek goddess, met him on his own ground and asked him for information. It was an honor which seemed to crown his head with a fillet of gold when she said that she would like him to show her in his microscope things she had not yet seen, and teach her more than she already knew. It was the noble touch of womanly dependence which rouses in a man's soul all that he has of heroism and devotion. Younger than himself, but how immeasurably superior, this beautiful girl-woman seemed to draw his whole being into hers, as the lake receives the rill, as the formless mist over the morass is absorbed into the infinite heaven. Had he been a Greek she would have represented to him the chaste splendor of that goddess who kissed the sleeping boy on Mount Latmos; had he been a Roman, she would have been the renewal of Numa's sacred counsellor; as a Roman Catholic, he would have seen in her the holy likeness of the blessed Virgin; as a Hindoo, she would have been Lachshmi, the female energy of Vishnu. She was in any case semi-divine; and he was glad now that he had braved the torment of this ordeal, seeing what great gift of grace and joy it had brought him. His face beamed like one who has met an angel by the way, and something deeper than its ordinary flat and level sentiments seemed to have come into it. But this delightful state of things could not last very long. Lady Elizabeth was too valuable a member of the small society on the lawn to be allowed to give herself to one only—and such a one as Caleb Stagg more especially.

Estelle was the one who came to disturb an interview which was beginning to really interest Lady Elizabeth, and to set the butterfly stirring within the chrysalis with Caleb. She was bored by Lord Eustace, and under the strict patrol of her mother's watchful eye she could not get so much as a whispered word with Charlie—scarcely a fleeting look. He at last, in a fit of jealous rage and despair, had gone to the hammock that swung untenanted between the two evergreen oaks. Estelle thought that if she were sheltered and shielded by Lady Elizabeth she might perhaps snatch a perilous five minutes of joy, soothe her lover's easily perturbed spirit and drink another draught of that sweet poison without which young life is but a desert and young hearts as dry as potsherds. Accordingly, the graceful girl came strolling up to where this strangely mated pair were sitting on the garden seat backed by azaleas and rhododendrons, and in a pretty beseeching way asked her friend to come with her for a little walk—and that walk would be to the two evergreen oaks between which the hammock was swinging, with Charlie Osborne eating his heart. The winding of the paths and the friendly intervention of flowering shrubs would hide them from Mrs. Clanricarde, and all would be well and without danger.

As Lady Elizabeth had it also at her heart as a duty to help poor Estelle when she could, and as she did not think that a new interest should overset an old one, she looked at Estelle kindly, and said, "Yes, I will go with you, dear," as Estelle knew she would.

Then, turning to Caleb, she asked, "Shall I introduce you to any one before I go?"

"Thank you, Lady Elizabeth. I don't think I care to know any one else, thank you, Lady Elizabeth," said Caleb, with a blush that made his ears as red as fleshy flames.

"But you will be dull, knowing no one," said the daughter of the Earl of Kingshouse, with as much kindly consideration and courtesy as if her brother's Polichinelle had been the son of a king.

"I think not, Lady Elizabeth," was his stammered reply.

She could not say "Will you come with us?" That would not have been fair to Estelle; but she wished she could have carried him with her, as she would have rescued some bird from boys, some monkey from a brutal showman.

"I'll just keep to myself, now that you are going, Lady Elizabeth," said Caleb, after a pause, between the Scylla of not liking to make an independent observation, and the Charybdis of not wishing this beautiful woman to trouble herself on his account.

"I am sorry to take Lady Elizabeth away," said Estelle, very kindly.

Had it been any one but Charlie Osborne she would have kept the poor fellow in his present safety and have thrown over all the rest.

"Oh, don't vex yourself, miss," Caleb answered, with another torrent of blushes. "I couldn't expect that ladies like Lady Elizabeth and yourself, miss, would stay with such as me," he added, with the deep humility of his kind.

"I am so sorry; but, oh, come, dear!" whispered Estelle, the selfishness of love sweeping away her philanthropy; and Lady Elizabeth turned away with a smile to poor Caleb that left on his bewildered soul the impression of moonlight on the water, of soft moss, of cool green forest glades, of a rare wild flower found on the edge of a sheltered pool, of all that there is of soothing and entrancing in nature. And while the two friends strolled away to carry comfort and bring joy to poor irritated Charlie Osborne, Caleb slunk into the shrubbery that sloped sharply downward to the river.

If he could have left the vicarage at this moment he would, but he was bound. He had not arrived punctually, and that had been a grievous thing to him. The card of invitation had said "4 to 7," and he had not been there till half-past 4. He had ordered the trap to return punctually on the stroke of 7, and it never occurred to him that he could leave before it came. He had, then, two long mortal hours to fill up, and how was he to fill them? The best thing he knew was to keep out of sight of every one; so he slunk into the shrubbery, and for the first time in these late enthusiastic years of study he forgot to look for creatures.

All nature seemed transformed, and he knew nothing of what he saw, or, rather, he saw nothing as it was about him. He felt as if in some strange place full of mild glory and an all-pervading but indefinite light. Tears, of which he was not conscious, slowly gathered in his wide-opened eyes and fell on his red silk tie. He was trembling with that kind of rapturous tremor which overpowers us in the presence of some sublime beauty of nature. The poor omad'haun! the poor Polichinelle! Who would have credited him with those birth-pangs of a new soul—he, in his glossy hat and tailor's triumphs of coat and trousers, his fawn-colored gloves and flashing horseshoe diamond pin! The satyr which enclosed the god, the temple, the gift of man to maid, of mother to child, was the archetype of poor Caleb's soul, imprisoned in such a body and overlaid by such conditions as nature and fortune had made for him!

CHAPTER IV.

THE GOLD THAT GLITTERS.

The matrimonial market at Kingshouse was really too heart-breaking! So Mrs. Clanricarde thought, in the incessant way of one who has a perennial grievance, though she had enough self-control not to think aloud. Here in Estelle was the winning number, and no prize to take! It was as though a thorough-bred trained for the Oaks had only costermongers' donkeys to contend against, and a bunch of turnip tops when the post was passed. It was indeed heart-breaking, with those family funds always decreasing, and good guineas going after bad like so many "moutons de Panurge." Lord Eustace was as purely a detrimental as Charlie Osborne himself, and from the same cause. He wanted money with his wife to float him off the financial shallows where at present he and all his house were stranded. He could not afford to marry for mere love and beauty; no man can nowadays who has not a good fortune firmly secured. Certainly no one in Kingshouse could, unless he were prepared to bring up a family on stirabout, and to dress them in blue house-flannel and workhouse sheeting.

Caleb Stagg was the only moneyed man available; and even Mrs. Clanricarde shrank from a creature who wore tailors' triumphs at an informal tennis party, and flaunted a flaring red tie with a flashing diamond pin. Still, he was rich beyond those dreams of avarice we all have heard of; and on the principle of the living dog and the dead lion, a golden calf is better than a leaden phœnix, and those who want butter on their bread must not be very nice as to the shape of the knife wherewith it is spread. Besides, no plastic substance is utterly hopeless to reform, and if Caleb Stagg had a mind at all, and his proper complement of limbs and senses, surely an astute mother-in-law could pull him into shape! Even all princes are not personable men, and other poets than Pope have been outside the pale of manly beauty.

Stirred, then, by all these reasons, more or less deliberately recognized, Mrs. Clanricarde went to Mrs. Stewart, and in her pretty French way, which beat all the English manner out of the field, asked what had become of Mr. Stagg. Poor young man!—it must be very triste for him, here among so many strangers! and should they find him and console him?

"He is somewhere about," said Mrs. Stewart, looking vaguely round. Truth to say she had forgotten him. Like many kind-hearted, brisk and energetic women, she was apt to be sporadic in her interests and a little unordered in her ways.

"Let us go and find him," said Mrs. Clanricarde, looking behind a rose-bush, as if he might be hiding in its shadow.

But they sought in vain. Deep down in the shrubbery, off the path and on the border of the river, the poor omad'haun sat cradling his new-born soul, and the things of time and space were to him as naught. Mrs. Stewart went the length of even a shrill little call, to which was no response, and the search was perforce abandoned. Meanwhile Estelle and Charlie Osborne made the most of their chance, and Mrs. Clanricarde lost on all sides at once.

The hours of pleasure passed and that of departure came on. That automatic memory of time, which seems to belong to the body rather than the mind, made Caleb know that he must rouse himself from his mental ecstasy and physical stupor and go through the ordeal of saying good-day to Mr. and Mrs. Stewart. As he came on to the lawn the whole party was assembled together. No one had yet gone. It seemed to Caleb as if all England was there. His round eyes took in no one precisely, no one personally. He only saw a very sea of bonnets and cricket caps, of colored frocks and white flannels, of women's faces and men's mustaches. Then he caught sight of two large lustrous gray eyes, and all the rest vanished like a phantasmagoria. Only those glorious eyes remained, as his home, his loadstar, his anchorage, in this bewildering sea of unfamiliar humanity.

Nothing of all this was shown. The face of a man is not as a sheet of glass through which can be read his thoughts and feelings. All that the assembled company saw was a round, flat, red-faced young man in an absurd get-up, staring at Lady Elizabeth Inchbold with all his might, and standing stock-still, as if struck to stone.

Lady Elizabeth herself broke the spell by saying, with marked kindness, to this mute star-gazer, whom she knew the rest were mutely ridiculing, "Have you seen that beautiful avenue of laburnums, Mr. Stagg? You were in the shrubbery, I think? Did you see them?"

Caleb blushed, as he naturally would when thus brought back to the things of the present.

"No, Lady Elizabeth," he said.

Poor fellow! As little as Jim Bludso did he know how to lie. Even those white lies of society, which save appearance and mask confession, were as far from his understanding as were the recognized shibboleths and authorized formulas.

"It was a pity to have missed them," said Mrs. Clanricarde, adopting Lady Elizabeth's tone, and looking with artificial benignity on the omad'haun, thickly plated with gold as he was—so thickly as to be almost possible

Caleb turned his round face and rounder eyes on the speaker with pitiable bewilderment. It was all like some distressful dream. Why should these people stand there looking at him? Their eyes, multiplied to hundreds, stuck like lances into his heart. He felt as if he had unwittingly committed some offence, and this was his arraignment. It was a nightmare; but he retained just so much of consciousness as to let him understand that Mrs. Clanricarde had spoken; and not knowing too clearly what she had said, nor what he ought to reply, his native courtesy came to his aid, and he answered, "Thank you, Mrs. Clanricarde," as the only thing that presented itself.

Though he had not been formally introduced to any one but Lady Elizabeth Inchbold, he knew quite well each individual of the assembly, when he could detach his wits from their wool gathering and force them into concrete observation. The Sunday club of church is the great photograph of a neighborhood, where people learn to know one another without speech or contact.

"Let me take you," said Mrs. Clanricarde, still benign and humane.

"I'm loth to trouble you, Mrs. Clanricarde," answered Caleb.

"It would be a pleasure," said Estelle's mother, with her airy French politeness; and Caleb, feeling as one in a mill-race dragged into the deep waters by a force he could not resist, was led like a calf by a wisp of straw to where the laburnums hung like golden fountains against the sky.

As she went, Mrs. Clanricarde commanded Estelle to accompany her by the look her daughter knew so well.

But Estelle remained impassive, and Charlie Osborne got the good of her contumacy.

Though at the time of their walk, which Mrs. Clanricarde did not hurry, the weight of conversation rested on her alone, she got answers of a kind from Caleb; but they were emphatically of a kind, and at the end she was no nearer anything like acquaintance or sympathy than she had been at the beginning. Her action had in it no real kindliness. It was essentially egotistic and well calculated; and the poor omad'haun felt the difference he could not have defined. But he was grateful all the same. She went through her self-appointed task with gallant consistency, and got so far on the way she wanted to go as to fix a day for Caleb to call at "Les Saules"—which local orthography spelled, and local intonation pronounced "Lissols." As he had at last entered society through the vicarage gate, there was no impropriety in opening her own. And she could try her hand at his reformation. If he proved hopeless, she had but to abandon him; if he were practicable—Estelle had before now taken a silver-coated pill. This of gold would also have to be taken.

When they returned to the lawn the great bulk of the company had gone. Lady Elizabeth was no longer there, and Estelle and Charlie Osborne had also disappeared. They had walked to the gate, where the carriage would overtake them—Estelle, resigned to brave the maternal tempest that she knew would follow on her act of disobedience and temerity, if only she could comfort and make happy her handsome lover meanwhile.

Then Caleb, shaking hands with Mr. and Mrs. Stewart and with Mrs. Clanricarde, so heartily that the ladies nearly shrieked as their fingers were cut by their rings, said, in his strange old world way, vivified from mummydum only by his excessive embarrassment, "And thank you, Mrs. Stewart, for my entertainment"—and the same to Mrs. Clanricarde, varying only the name. But his heart was heavy, and the world seemed empty, and he felt that he had been worse than a boor and less polite than a coal heaver in that he had not been able to say the same to Lady Elizabeth, to whom he owed so much more than to any one else.

"Old Grimes."

"Old Grimes," that familiar "little felicity in verses," which caught the popular fancy as far back as 1823, was a sudden inspiration of the late Judge Albert G. Greene, of Providence, R. I., who found the first verse in a collection of old English ballads, and, enjoying its humor, built up the remainder of the poem in the same conceit.

The steamer Cariboo Fly returned to Victoria, B. C., on Saturday night from an exploring trip to the Queen Charlotte Islands. The captain, a white boy and seven Indians escaped.

The eloper, Charles Clarence, who took away with him the wife of Mr. Buckborough, of Ingersoll, appeared before the London Police Magistrate on Saturday morning. The prisoner was therefore remanded for a week on the charge of assaulting the lady at whose house he stayed while in London and whom he refused to pay.

A terrible accident occurred on Saturday in the new Perreault block on St. James street east, Montreal. The building is of an immense height, and the workmen were engaged in taking down the internal scaffolding. A laborer named Louis Revel was standing on the ground and was in the act of lowering three scaffold planks, which had been lashed together, from the eighth story, when a heavy pine block suddenly fell from above and crashed down through the centre of the building on the poor fellow's head. His head was terribly fractured, and he died shortly afterwards.

John Burney, driver of the Shedden mail cart between the depot and Post-office at London, was the victim of a most brutal assault on Saturday. The teamster in charge of the Shedden stables, it seems, has orders to clean them every morning at a certain hour. This order has caused more or less trouble, and several disputes. Burney found it necessary to go to the stables in the morning, and on attempting to go in was ordered back by the teamster in charge. He insisted on entering, however, when the man struck him, knocking him off the step to the ground, a distance of three or four feet, and breaking his collar bone and one rib. As Burney is an old man upwards of 60 the injuries to him are very serious.

Some time ago a man named Charles Clarence eloped from Ingersoll with a woman named Pucdarry, accompanied by a boy, the child of the latter, and going to London, engaged apartments in the east end, where they remained for some time. They left suddenly in a buggy, and it is feared expressed the boy to some unknown destination. They have not since been heard of. The woman is of rather prepossessing appearance, but lame.

The Queen will leave England for the continent, according to the present arrangements, on Tuesday, March 5th, for Biarritz, where she intends to reside for a month. "Capt." Jack Finnessy, who was sent to penitentiary some time ago for a brutal attack on his wife, will have another charge to answer to when he is released. A woman in Manitoba has written to Ottawa claiming that the gay captain married her while on a flying trip through the Prairie Province. She was lately delivered of twins, and was anxious that the father of her children should know of the occurrence. Since his committal to penitentiary Finnessy's real wife died. The Manitoba woman has been apprised of the present address of her soi-disant husband, while he has likewise been notified of the additions to his family.

ODD DEVELOPMENTS IN AFRICA.

Explorer Stanley, it seems, has been having a good time in the great Central African wilds, albeit his journeyings are as yet a trifle mysterious. The present aspect of affairs in regard to Central Africa is, to say the least, a trifle ludicrous. The letters of Stanley to Tippo Tib, the ex-slave driver who has always been a friend to the intrepid explorer, shows pretty conclusively that long after the outside public had suspected Tippo's loyalty, and had accused him of being privy to the murder of Barttelot, the second-in-command of the relief expedition, the most cordial relations existed between him and Stanley. That is one point cleared up. But the doings of Emin Bey yet remain a mystery. When Stanley started out, it was with the object of rescuing that European who had managed to retain control of a vast territory in the centre of the continent long after Gordon's butchery at Khartoum. Then it was asserted that Emin was in imminent danger, and that his only chance of escape lay in sending an expedition to him with "fighting supplies" and men. The expedition went, and it has returned as it came, down the great river Congo, but no Emin accompanies it. That much-pitied individual has, according to Stanley, all that he needs. He is living in luxury, and is apparently pretty much monarch of all he surveys. It looks as if he had refused to be saved from all this comfort, and the expedition to rescue him from his supposed perilous position has degenerated into a huge exploratory caravan. One would suppose that after the evidence thus adduced by Stanley, the white ruler of Central Africa would be taken at his word, and left alone to work out the great problem in which he is engaged, until such time, at any rate, as Stanley finds it convenient to return to civilization and report the progress which he made with the remarkable man, whose career is not even second, in point of romance, to that of the dead hero of Khartoum. But the would-be saviours of Emin increase. The latest is Mr. Stevens, the bicyclist, who achieved notoriety some time ago through his accomplishment of a journey by wheel through many Eastern lands. He will try his hand at saving Emin, and at the same time endeavor to get at the true inwardness of the African slave trade. It can no longer be doubted that the traffic in human flesh is the one great obstacle to the extension of civilization and legitimate trade on the African continent, and even though it does look somewhat stupid for explorers to persist in trying to rescue a man who does not want to be rescued, the other part of Mr. Stevens' mission, if intelligently carried out, may be fraught with important results.

And, swaying with them, on you go,
When well you know 'twill be your plight
To sit out on the steps all night,
How very, very nice 'twould be
If now you had your old night key—
But you haven't.

When rain comes down in torrents swift
And melts to slush the sleety drift
When clouds in blackness are unfurled,
And water on the earth is hurled,
How nice 'twould be if now you owned
The silk umbrella that you loaned,
But you don't.

When lingering long with her you wait
And talk of hope and love and fate,
And sit and sigh and sigh and sit,
And wish the clock would halt a bit,
How gay with joy your heart would leap
Were her dear father fast asleep,
But he isn't.

Yesterday.

My friend, he spoke of a woman face:
It puzzled me, and I paused to think.
He told of her eyes and mouth, the trace
Of prayer on her brow, and quick as wink
I said: "Oh yes, but you wrong her years,
She's only a child, with faiths and fears
And childhood fit. I tell thee boy
She was a girl just yesterday."

"The years are swift and sure, I trow
(Quoth he). "You speak of the long ago."

Once I strolled in a garden spot,
And every flower upraised a head
(So it seemed), for they, I wot,
Were maidens of mine; each bloom and bed,
Their hours for sleep, their merry mood,
The lives and deaths of the whole sweet brood,
Were known to me; it was my way
To visit them but yesterday.

Spake one red rose, in a language low:
"We saw you last in the long ago."

Entering under the lintel wide,
I saw the room, 'twas all the same
The oaken press and the shelves aside
The window, small for the sunset flame,
The book I loved on the table large;
I oped'd, and lo! in the yellow marge
The leaf I placed was shrunk and gray,
I swear it was green but yesterday!

Then a voice stole out of the sunset glow:
"You lived here, man, in the long ago.

'Tis the same old tale, though it comes to me
By a hundred paths of pain and glee.
Till I guess the truth at last, and know
That Yesterday is the Long Ago.

Rock your brother's wife's for your board;

Masonic.

The New York Masons have resolved to establish their State Home for aged Masons at Utica. The institution is to be a home for indigent Masons, needy orphans and widows of masons. The money invested in the establishment will be $200,000 at the outset, and this will be increased by the addition of new buildings as rapidly as required. There is already provided a handsome sum for the maintenance of the institution, one large source of revenue being the income from the Masonic Temple in New York, which was erected at a cost of a million and a half of dollars. Allowing each lodge in the State to send one inmate only, the population of the proposed Home would be 717 at the start, and the tendency would be toward an increase all the while.

Papa—No; I've forbidden him the house, and won't even allow his name to be mentioned. She's always thinking of him in consequence. I'm in hopes she'll marry him some day.

Neglected Opportunities.

Sympathetic Visitor—Poor man! What are you here for?

THE WORLD AND ITS DISCLOSURES.

It is amusing to note the gullibility of our respected contemporaries. The Toronto World, of late, has been slashing into the license commissioners of Toronto, and our confrers take this as an evidence that that paper is the champion of morality in every form, and especially municipal affairs. They claim that the mountains raised by this little sheet in license matters should be investigated by the Ontario Government, and that the large dailies are derelict in their duty by ignoring the "sensation" entirely. In this respect the big dailies know better than their little brothers what their "duty" consists of, and whether silence is golden. The World desires to sell its paper, and that is the one consideration which has caused all this hullabaloo. It is not a matter of principle the World is fighting for; it is to regain a prestage which has failed it during the past six months—it is dollars and cents. Grip of last week voices our own bitterly earned experience when it says, "There is no such word as principle found in the World's lexicon." Already it has had two cases of criminal libel on its hands, the outcome of its "sensations." It does not voice any party or live for any purpose excepting its own miserably selfish ends. Its opinions and "disclosures" have no weight with the people, therefore the larger city papers ignore its little tactics and demonstrate their wisdom thereby. Their very silence is redolent of eloquence.

A Reply to Mr. Grainger

To the Editor of The Advance.

DEAR SIR,—In the proceedings [illegible] of the Grey farmers [illegible] which was moved by Mr. [illegible] and seconded by Mr. [illegible] That this meeting [illegible] the present grant [illegible] for [illegible] be [illegible] a certain number of [illegible] for [illegible] each year, [illegible] until they are all [illegible]

Cheap Money for the Farmers.

To the Editor of The Advance.

[illegible] the Central Farmers' Institute [illegible] will shortly meet in the city of Toronto for the purpose of discussing matters calculated to promote farmers' interests, would it not be advisable for them upon their part to memorialize the Local Legislature at its coming session to enact a measure empowering municipalities to borrow money upon the credit of such municipality to the extent of say four-fifths of the real value of property, by some means, hereafter to be decided, distributed to the farmers, the security being a first lien upon real estate in sums not greater than one half the cash value of such property. The interest at as low as workable, expenses would be met, added to the first cost of money, by so doing farmers would receive substantial aid and relief by but

Now that money is so cheap the workingmen see no reason why farmers should be called to pay 7 and 8 per cent. to companies and others. I learn from the Montreal Herald of the 19th inst. [illegible] state of Massachusetts has negotiated a loan of about one million dollars bearing over a period of about [illegible] at 2.916 per cent., and we [illegible] respect inferior to those in a [illegible] credit of Grey. By this mode [illegible] reasonably expect money [illegible] 5 per cent., and farmers now [illegible] the rate of interest on their [illegible] at 6 per cent. The total [illegible] of the Province of Ontario is [illegible] $109,000,000 [illegible] municipalities is [illegible] $8,000,000 [illegible] proportion of the County of Grey [illegible] account's had a mind [illegible] that sum, hence [illegible] owing to their [illegible] Grey would be $40,000 richer.

The Institutes [illegible] very much accomplished much good in the farming community, and I trust they will concentrate themselves at their next [illegible] by pressing this matter upon the attention of the Local Legislature, and it is to be hoped our local representatives will take the initiative in the government.

Manufacturing and railway monopolies are favored topics for political partizans, but here is a question of vital importance which, if carried to a successful issue, would largely tend to benefit the farmers, and it is to be hoped will meet the hearty approval and co-operation of all, irrespective of party politics.

The Recent Tannery Fire.

To the Editor of The Advance.

DEAR SIR,—The lapse of time seems to have effaced from the minds of those who have the best interests of Flesherton at heart, the serious consequences arising from the disaster, no steps having been taken, so far as the writer is aware, to induce the unfortunate proprietor to rerect the tannery. In a couple of hours the devouring element swept away an important industry, thus imposing a very serious loss upon a very worthy citizen, and is of the greatest consequence not only to this village but to the farmers in the surrounding districts, that this industry should not be permitted to pass from our midst without an effort made to retain. It in the face of the overtures that have reached Mr. Damude from other quarters, shall Flesherton remain passive? The question then is, is the tannery to be rebuilt? or are the heaps of ashes to remain as a standing monument of their indifference to their own interests?

Mr. Damude in public and in private, is naturally an out and out gentleman, and one who takes a deep interest in everything pertaining to the welfare of the village.

Hoping this matter will be taken up by our ratepayers, I remain

On Friday, Jan. 18, the U. S. S. held their annual entertainment in the Orange Hall. The day was fine, but the roads were rendered almost impassible by the recent thaw. Notwithstanding this drawback the hall was filled to overflowing. After partaking of an excellent tea, to which all did ample justice, and for which Eugenia has become proverbial for supplying, the literary part of the entertainment was entered upon, with Mr. Meldrum, superintendent, in the chair. The pupils of the school gave some excellent recitations and dialogues in a manner that reflected credit on themselves, as well as on their instructor, and which interested and pleased as evinced by the hearty rounds of applause which elicited from the audience after each performance. Quite a number of the pupils under the able tutorage of Mr. F. T. Carr, gave a number of sacred songs in a very creditable manner, Motto Song, "God is Love", by nine little girls, being especially commendable. A number of songs by the choir, with Miss Pedlar presiding at the organ, were also well rendered. The instrumental music of the violin and reed organ, by Messrs. Williams, Pedlar and Sloan, was heartily encored and responded to. And allow me to mention here, though not least, a short address by the Rev. Mr. Watson, Baptist minister, of Flesherton. His remarks were well chosen and pithy and directed particularly to the young present.

In connection with the [illegible] was realized from the Tuesday's [illegible] The [illegible] consisted of recitations, dialogues, instrumental and vocal music. Miss Anna Carruthers gave a violin solo in her usual pleasing style.

Total proceeds of the two entertainments amounted to $12.60.

Epping Correspondence.

Death entered the home of Mr. G. Pentland on Friday evening, Jan. 18th, and claimed for his victim Ida, the third daughter aged thirteen. For the past two years she has been suffering from that dreaded disease, consumption. She was a very patient sufferer and was never heard to murmur. On Friday morning she said, "Mother I am very tired and am going to die," but she cheered her weeping friends by telling them she was quite prepared to die, and she was going a little before. Some time before she was taken sick she had given her heart to God and was a very constant member of the Union church, but since her removal to Epping her sickness prevented her attending the house of God. Her former pastor, Rev. Mr. Madden, visited her the day before her death and she requested that he would conduct her funeral services, which he did. About eleven a.m. on Monday Jan. 21st, her remains left her father's for the Thornbury cemetery, followed by a large concourse of sorrowing friends and neighbors.

Flesherton Station.

From our own Correspondent.

The timbermen are taking advantage of the good roads at present, as there has been a large amount of square timber delivered here within the last week or so. They say if the present snow would stay with us through the month of February they would have their season's cut all delivered.

Mr. McGill and Mr. Harrington have removed to their new station house, and it was not any too soon, owing to the smallness of their late office. The change is a pleasant one to them. Their office is a model of neatness and comfort. The sitting room has been a long felt want by the travelling public, but now they have all that can be desired in the way of comfort. The interior part of the building is well laid out for comfort and convenience. I think at no distant day the rooms will be furnished with a clean cut fit. The company have made some provisions against fire, in the shape of having water tanks in connection with the building.

At present Mr. A. Hannah is visiting his son and daughter over in Michigan.

Mr. Thos. Addison, formerly of this place, but now of Barrie, paid us a visit last week. He is head agent for an implement firm in Barrie. Tom looks well.

In talking to a Fleshertonian the other day he remarked to me, as a rule the stores of the station undersold those of Flesherton. Now, that being the case, why dont the merchants of this place advertise in The Advance and let the surrounding country know these prices? Friend Woods, take the lead.

Mr. Crossley of Flesherton, and Mr McGinnis, of this place, are in partnership in the livery business. They have good horses and for their outfit they won't take a back seat. Mr. Crossley is a live man and is bound to do a live business. I would just say to friend Crossley to accomplish that it would be well to take a half interest in the Beehive and then advertise in The Advance.

Miss Wright, the present teacher, so far has the confidence of both parents and children. The children are advancing rapidly under her tuition.

Ever since the departure of the late school teacher to Durham, Mr. W. has been somewhat despondent and at times feverish—say lover fever. To raise his spirits he was advised to take a trip to himself, so he went to Lewiston by way of Durham to recuperate. May you recover, Will.

Mr. James Humphill and Mr. Angus McLeod had a son and daughter presented to them last week. Our population is increasing.

Mr. R. Cook is on the warpath again after live stock of all kinds if only fat. May you never grow lean, Bob.

Last night at Constable Smith of the County of Peel, accompanied by constables McAvoy and Baron, of Owen Sound, went to the village of Brooklyn, in the township of Owen Sound, in search of a criminal named Harry Penny, who had robbed and attempted to murder and poison a farmer near Inglewood. Penny has a brother living in Brooklyn, and so the three constables repaired there. They were denied admission, but knew their way in only too well as indicated in finding their game. They, however, had an early hug this morning and one of their number roused in a hay-stack and had a lively time taking him, but he was finally overpowered.

C. C. Pearce, license inspector for North Grey, is not a man that can be fooled around with impunity. Driving home the other evening some wahoo whom he was passing raised a 'black snake' whip and gave the inspector's horse a cut across the back, causing the animal, which was a high tempered one, to kick and plunge, breaking the shafts, and then attempt to run away. Having got his horse under control Mr. Pearce turned about and followed the cam of the fellow. He caught up to him. Leaving the horse in charge of a friend who was with him, he sprang into the man's sleigh and grappling him, struck him fair in the face with his whip. Than a tussle began. The man who began the trouble, was a big, burly fellow, weighing about 250 pounds, while our citizen weighs much less. Grabbing him by the neck, the inspector threw his opponent back ward over the edge of the hay rack into the road. The fellow begged mercy and said his leg was broken. Drawing his hand-cuffs, Mr. Pearce placed them on the wrists of the fellow who had started the fun. At the solicitation of his employer, and by depositing $10 to cover the damages he was released.

A STARTLING STORY.

A Fenian Witness on the Phœnix Park Murders.

THE INVINCIBLES AND FENIANS.

A London cable says: Upon the resumption of the session of the Parnell Commission yesterday morning, presiding Justice Hannen said Mr. O'Brien's article in United Ireland, for which he was summoned to appear before the court, exceeded a fair discussion of the case under investigation, but he admitted that there was some force in Mr. O'Brien's arguments regarding the continued circulation of the Times pamphlet, and said he believed no disrespect was intended to be shown towards the court by the article. Therefore he would not punish Mr. O'Brien. He added, however, that in future cases of a similar nature would be more severely treated Patrick Delaney, a convict in the Maryborough prison, testified that he belonged to the Fenians until September, 1882. The principal leaders of the organization were Messrs. Egan, Brennan, Dr. McAllister, John Lavey and John Doran. About 1879 a number of delegates, including John O'Connor, John Devoy and Gen. Millen, came from America, and the witness attended a meeting in Foresters' Hall, Dublin, at which John Devoy represented the American Council and Gen. Millen inspected the military organization. It was arranged that arms be provided and the expenses paid. At another meeting held in the Rotunda, Messrs. Davitt, Parnell, Egan, Biggar, Dillon, Brennan and Harris attended. Curley, at this meeting, attacked Mr. Davitt for not adhering to the principles of the organization. After the meeting the witness was told that the circles were not opposed to the League, which would organize the Fenians in the country and supply them with arms.

The witness said he had forgotten a portion of the Invincibles' oath, but the principal was to assassinate the Viceroy and the whole Executive of Ireland. The Invincibles received money from the League. Messrs. Egan, Byrne and Tynan paid some to Daniel Delaney, Mullett and Brady. The witness was deputed to watch the movements of Mr. Forster, at that time Chief Secretary for Ireland. Joseph Brady and Timothy Kelly were to shoot Mr. Forster, while witness was to intercept persons crossing the Queen street bridge while Kelly and Brady endeavored to carry out their purpose.

Witness took no part in the Phœnix Park murders. Mrs. Byrne brought over the two knives that were used in committing those murders. At a meeting of a committee of the Invincibles held after the Phœnix Park murders, a quantity of gold and bank notes were laid upon the table. Afterwards more revolvers, daggers and money came.

Delaney further spoke of an attempt to hire a house on Castle Hill, from which officials of the castle could be shot with rifles. Carey failed to get the house. In 1881, when Carey was a candidate for the Dublin Municipal Council, Egan promised that all his expenses would be paid. Egan held that an Invincible ought to be Lord Mayor. Delaney identified letters signed by Egan. When questioned in regard to Egan's letter, in which reference is made to a fund, Delaney said he knew nothing about a fund.

On cross-examination by Sir Charles Russell, the witness admitted that when 17 years old he was sentenced to penal servitude for five years for highway robbery. He enrolled himself with the Fenians the same night he left prison. When he was accused of the Phœnix Park murders he gave the authorities all the information in his possession. It was his wife who, while visiting him in prison, warned him that he was suspected in connection with the Phœnix Park murders. He thereupon supplied a written statement to the prison officials. When asked how he came to give the Times evidence, he stated that Crown Solicitor Shannon came to the jail a fortnight ago and took his sworn statement. Recurring to the Fenian organization, he declared that it was never an assassination society except in cases where somebody informed against them. The Fenians sought to fight openly, and were very different from the Invincibles. He knew Egan, Brennan and Byrne to be Fenians in 1876, having met them at a secret meeting. He admitted that he never met them among the Invincibles, but knew they were leaders of the Invincibles through Carey and others. He never saw any one of them giving money to anybody, but had seen money on a table at which Byrne was sitting. The witness stated that he was sentenced to death for complicity in the Phœnix Park murders, and Lord Spencer commuted his sentence to life imprisonment, which he is now undergoing.

A London cable says: The cross-examination of Patrick Delaney was resumed before the Parnell Commission yesterday. The witness persisted in declaring that he saw Boyton point out to Invincible Brady the Chairman of the Prison Board, Mr. Bourke, for assassination. On cross-examination by Michael Davitt, Delaney said he was positive that he had often seen Davitt in company with Dan Curley, although he could not fix the dates. Re-examined with reference to the funds of the Fenians, he stated that until 1879 the party was without money other than the few pence weekly subscribed by members. Some pawned their watches to send delegates to America. Carey, after the Invincibles were organized, obtained funds from the League and started business as a contractor. Being shown the photograph of a man in uniform, witness declared that it was Invincible No. 1. At the close of the examination Justice Hannen ordered that Delaney be held in custody in London in case he should be wanted again.

Attorney-General Webster then read correspondence between Mat. Harris and Michael Davitt with reference to the land agitation. The only letter that attracted attention was one from Davitt to Harris, written in New York, in which Davitt said: "Perhaps you are not aware that John O'Leary is here. He came from Paris to upset my Land League endeavors. He will go back a wiser though a sadder man. He is supported by nobody saving the few bosthoons following that blatant ass, Rossa. The Nationalists on this side are commonsense men. O'Leary failed to get up a crusade against the League in America. Rossa is now trying his hand. He will achieve more success upon your side than upon this. He is a cowardly, low ruffian, who has not the courage to resent an insult I offered him in the Herald. He has not sufficient courage to set fire to a British haystack. Do your utmost to keep the people within bounds."

Justice Hannen asked if the letters of Mr. Parnell would be shown to the Parnellite counsel, as the court seemed to be within a reasonable distance of getting at them.

Attorney-General Webster refused to be pinned to a definite time for the production of the letters.

Justice Hannen then expressed the opinion that both sides should show the letters in their possession intended to be used for comparison.

A London cable says: The taking of evidence was further resumed at the Parnell Commission yesterday. Capt. Plunkett, chief of the Cork police, testified as to the perpetration of outrages. He said he knew of no support given to tenants in their non-payment of rent and resistance to eviction except that given by the Land and National Leagues. Matters had improved since the passage of the Coercion Act.

Referring to the further disclosure of documents, Mr. Asquith, counsel for Mr. Parnell, said that after a consultation with Sir Charles Russell it had been decided not to press the inspection of the alleged facsimile letters of Mr. Parnell.

Capt. Plunkett, on cross-examination, created a sensation by stating that he had heard Father O'Connor, the parish priest of Firies, denounce at a cattle sale a farmer named Curtin, and that a week later the farmer was murdered. Father O'Connor did not name Curtin, but he alluded to him in such a way that there could be no mistake as to whom he meant. Replying to Mr. Davitt, the witness admitted that he met secretly in Cork in 1883 the Irish American McDermott. He declined to say whether or not he knew McDermott as a paid agent of the police. French, the head of the detective force, also met McDermott. The witness did not know that French had paid McDermott money to concoct dynamite plots.

Mr. Parnell is at present confined to the house with an attack of rheumatism in the shoulder. While his illness is very painful it is nothing serious, and he is expected to be about in a few days.

GAMBLED AND LOST.

A Young Man and a Young Woman Suicide at Monte Carlo.

A London cable says: The young man and woman who committed suicide at Monte Carlo yesterday were respectively 29 and 19 years of age. They were natives of Lyons and had spent the winter together at Monte Carlo. Neither was known, nor has their identity as yet been established, but they brought with them large sums of money and spent most of their time at the gaming-tables, roulette being their favorite game. When they had reached the bottom of their combined purse they wrote to friends in Nice announcing the fact, and asserting that they contemplated suicide. Upon receipt of a letter from one of them, a friend hurried to Monte Carlo, but was refused admission to their room, an officer of the police giving as reason for refusal the information that the couple were dead. Other information concerning the couple was requested, but that was also refused, and, in the interest of the prevailing "industry" at Monte Carlo, the proprietors and attaches of the hotel made every effort to suppress publicity of the tragedy.

A Victim of Dance House Dives.

A Chicago despatch says: The stories of the horrors suffered by unfortunate girls in the dance house stockades in Northern Wisconsin were recalled by a scene in the Court of Insane Inquiry this morning. A slight and handsome young girl, dressed in black, was led in. Hattie Nathan was her name, so the doctor told Judge Prendergast. He said her ailment was acute mania. As he spoke, the prisoner glanced behind her and cowered in her chair, muttering: "Save me! they are after me. I hear them barking, and the men are right behind them." Hattie Nathan was the daughter of parents who live in Oconto, Wis. She was a wayward girl and got into trouble, which resulted in her entering one of the brothels near Marinette. She soon realized the horrors of her position, and made repeated but unsuccessful attempts to escape, with the result that she became demented. Then she was released. She next appeared at the door of a house of ill-repute in this city, and was cared for. She has remained there since, being rational a portion of the time. Of late her dementia has been more acute, and the result was to-day's proceedings. She will be sent back to her home in Oconto.

A Bride's Terrible Experience.

On Tuesday at Millhaven Samuel Paterson and Fred. Sterling broke through the ice while skating. Herbert Milligan, hearing their cries, ran to the rescue with a board, but before he reached the lads he went through and immediately sank, the only apparent struggle being the raising of his hand above water. His wife, sister and mother watched with alarm his gallant attempt to save the lads. They saw him lose his own life. His wife was a bride of two weeks, being a daughter of Henry Benjamin, of Ernesttown. She had to be dragged into the house. Meanwhile the boys were rescued, Paterson getting on the ice and keeping his comrade from sinking until help arrived.

A Dastardly Deed.

Fred Foster was arrested on Saturday evening for perpetrating a brutal outrage in a saloon at Sandusky, Ohio. James Farrell, an inoffensive fellow, was lying on a table in the saloon in a drunken stupor, and Foster conceived the idea of playing a joke on him, and for that purpose purchased a pint of whiskey, which he poured over Farrell's clothing, and then set the liquor on fire. The drunken man was instantly enveloped in flames, and ran shouting from the room. Some men soon caught him and extinguished the flames, but not until he was terribly burned.

It is an old belief that an animal that goes into winter quarters fat is half wintered. Perhaps there are none of our domestic animals to which this saying is more applicable than to sheep.

A MAN OF MANY WIVES.

Five Times a Bigamist?—Prescott Police Take Their Prisoner East From Whitby.

A Whitby despatch says: Constable Crites, of Prescott, with an assistant arrived here this morning and has returned with the prisoner Silas E. Seymour, alias W. J. Shaver, alias Martin, arrested here last evening on charges of horse stealing and bigamy telegraphed from the town down the St. Lawrence. The innocent young girl, apparently not more than 17, who came here with Seymour, stated that she met him only two weeks ago Saturday, and that they were married the following Thursday. Her maiden name was Fish and her home in Gananoque. For a wedding trip they went to Toronto, where he got a livery and drove to Whitby. In selling the horse and buggy to raise money enough for fares to Buffalo from here, he got into trouble. No one has yet claimed the property at Sebert's. Seymour, it was stated by the Prescott policeman, had only a few months ago been released from the Kingston Penitentiary, six months before his time was up, because of exemplary behavior, after serving a term there for bigamy. This is his sixth venture on the sea of matrimony. During the preliminary hearing before Police Magistrate Harper the simple girl, who has so sadly erred in hastily marrying the scoundrel, with wondering innocence listened to the discussion by the court officials of how she was to be taken care of, when finally the kind-hearted magistrate settled the matter by lending Policeman Crites $10 with which to pay her fare home, and she went without a word, it is hoped a wiser woman. One of Seymour's victims is now respectably married and living at Belleville. At the time that Shaver figured before the public there he was engaged in keeping a small store at Omemee, the business having been started with his then wife's money. He went to Belleville on business one day, and hunting up a girl that he had formerly courted, was quietly married by Rev. J. B. Clarkson, now in Cobourg. Chief McKinnon learned of the marriage, and knowing of Shaver's character followed him to Trenton. He had stopped with his bride to call on a friend on the way, when the Chief found them and brought the girl back to her friends, and the bigamist was sent to Kingston for three years.

TRY, TRY AGAIN.

A Persistent Lover Successful at Last.

A Belleville despatch says: There was a quiet marriage at St. John's Church this morning, and the story as told by an intimate acquaintance of both parties sounds very romantic. Some 17 years ago Mr. Reginald Lambton Sewell, a son of the Chief Justice of Quebec, was teller in the local branch Bank of Montreal. He was handsome, affable, fond of society, and was courted by a wide circle of friends. He fell in love with a Belleville belle, but courted in vain. His suit was rejected repeatedly, and, finally despairing of success, he gave up his position and left the city. For a time he was in the Imperial Bank at Toronto, but after a time disappeared entirely, at least so far as his Belleville friends were concerned. In the meantime the lady of his choice was wooed and won by the late Charles W. Bell. They had been married but a few years when Mr. Bell died, leaving a young widow and an infant son. Shortly after the old lover returned and renewed his suit, but with no better success than had attended him at first. He has been absent for some four years, but returned yesterday. The result of this visit was that a license was secured in the evening, and this morning Rev. D. F. Bogart tied the nuptial knot and the couple took the noon train for the east. The whole affair was so quietly and quickly carried out that not even the most intimate friends of the bride knew of it, but there are scores in the city who will remember 17 years ago and think of the old adage, "Faint heart never won fair lady."

The Opium Smugglers Sentenced.

An Albany despatch says: In the United States District Court yesterday the grand jury made its presentment. Chang Lee, Low How and Ah Quong, of Buffalo, were indicted for smuggling opium into the United States from Canada. Ah Quong and Low How pleaded guilty. Low How was fined $400. Ah Quong was sentenced to the Albany County Penitentiary for two years and fined $100. The evidence against Chang Lee was insufficient, and he was acquitted, having pleaded not guilty. Wm. Lund and Edmund Mellinger, of Erie county, accomplices of the Chinamen in smuggling opium, pleaded guilty to the charge of smuggling opium at Suspension Bridge and were fined $400 and committed to the Erie County Jail until it should be paid. The fact that they had given testimony which assisted in the detection of the smugglers was adduced to mitigate their sentence. Yesterday the jury in the case of Ephraim Gardner, charged with smuggling opium across the Canadian border at Cape Vincent at Ogdensburg, was discharged and the case was laid over to the March term. Bail was fixed at $2,000.

Experimental Engagement Rings.

Young man, confidentially—I want to see some of your solitaire rings. Jeweller—Engagement ring, I presume. Young man—Y-yes, sir. Jeweller—Here's just the thing you want, Alaska stone, rolled plate and warranted for a year. Young man—But I want a real stone. Jeweller—Of course. As I was going to say, we give one of the plated rings along with each real stone. They are exact duplicates. If the engagement be a success it is very easy to substitute the real for the imitation.—Terre Haute Express.

Two Boys Married.

A Columbia (S. C) despatch says: A strong effort has been made to have a marriage license law in this State, and advocates of the measure have been strengthened by a trick played on the Rev. A. Durham, of Piedmont, by Franklin Merritt and Robert Dilworth, two young men, the former being attired as a woman, who applied to be married. The ceremony was performed, and the preacher inserted the marriage notice in a local paper before he was undeceived.

Jay Gould will take a trip through the South to recuperate.

MR. FOGG'S STRANGE STORY.

Read His Own Name on a Tombstone—A Wanderer for Twenty Years.

An Oxford, Me., despatch says: An old man with gray hair and beard, bowed down with years and feeble, was seen on the day before Christmas groping his way slowly, like one partially blind, among the graves in the old churchyard. In spite of his years his frame showed great strength and power of endurance. His name was Ezekiel Fogg, and as he stooped before an old stone, crumbling with the frost of many winters, he had the unusual experience of witnessing his own name engraved thereon. The fact was that, although alive and still vigorous, he had been for years dead to his family and friends, and they had marked his death by a suitable mound and headstone. The old man has had a romantic life since last he saw his friends. He started for the west over twenty years ago and settled in Plattsburg, N.Y., for a short time, only to continue on in his travels until he reached a town in Nebraska, where he worked in a stone quarry. There his wife and son Frank, a child in arms, joined him later, but after a year or two they came back to Maine, the father agreeing to follow in a few days. Fogg did not return and no word was heard from him except an undenied story that he had been murdered for his money. It was reported that three strangers hired him to guide them through the woods to a distant town. Then the names of A. S. Fuller, a Mr. Stetson and two others were coupled with a story of murder in which the strangers had been hired to put him out of the way. Fogg travelled about in various parts of the west, arriving at one time in Arkansas and living later as a hunter and trapper in the mountains of the far west. One day he found a Maine paper and he read of the death of a man bearing the name of his only son. This revived his memories and he decided to return home, hoping that he might find some trace of his family, and also that he could be benefited by the treatment of a skilful oculist.

A CAT IN THE ORGAN.

A New Kind of Church Music Causes a Sensation.

A Syracuse (N. Y.) despatch says: There has been a mystery about the large pipe organ at St. Paul's Cathedral for a week. Whenever H. R. Fuller, the organist, touched the keys, weird noises were heard in the interior.

There was a large attendance at the morning service yesterday. The Rev. Dr. Lockwood was in the middle of the benediction when a large, wild-looking maltese cat made a flying leap over the head of the organist and landed near W. J. West, a member of the choir, fastening its claws in his knee. Before the cat could be seized it was half way down the side aisle. A gentleman in the rear tried to catch it, but only succeeded in making it double its tracks and go rushing up the main aisle straight for Dr. Lockwood. The worthy rector lost his place in the prayer as he caught sight of the wild-eyed cat rapidly approaching. The cat did not pause, but rushed between the feet of the excited chorus boys. A few seconds later and the cat was back again in its old quarters in the organ. It was some time before the interrupted service could be resumed. An investigation showed that the cat had made her home in the organ and had broken several of the smaller "trackers." The ecclesiastical authorities have made every effort to capture the cat, but without success.

Niagara District Fairs.

A Dunnville despatch says: The second annual convention of the Fair Managers' Association of Niagara District assembled here yesterday in the Opera House. A large delegation was present, representing the following agricultural societies: St. Catharines, Union, Monck, Welland, Dunnville, Cayuga, Netherby, Saltfleet, Gainsboro', Caistor, Pelham, Thorold, South Grimsby, North Grimsby, Rainham, Clinton and Niagara. A number of topics of much importance to agricultural societies were introduced by competent persons and freely discussed and much information gained. A fair circuit is being prepared, which will be published later. The question of expert judging, by A. Docker, President of the Dunnville Society, was dwelt largely upon, but no definite conclusion was arrived at as yet. The matter of directors and their duties, by Erland Lee, of the Saltfleet Society, was a very important paper, and much improvement is looked for in the selection of competent officials. "Fairs as an Educator of the People," by A. Livingstone, of the North Grimsby Society, received sharp discussion, and many good results were shown from fairs being held. The election of officers for the ensuing year and other matters will be brought up at to-morrow's session.

The Old Man's Darling.

A Peterboro' despatch says: An elopement under peculiar circumstances occurred the other day. A well-to-do farmer in Cardiff township named Hughey, had an 18-year-old daughter whose affections were won by a neighboring farmer named Evans, a widower aged nearly 40 years. The father didn't favor the suit, and sent the girl to Peterboro' to separate the two. Evans found out the girl's whereabouts and began communicating with her. To prevent this, the father decided to make another change and bring the girl back home, but the lover, learning of his intentions, stole a march on the old man and drove down to Paterboro', a distance of 60 miles, to secure his lady love. She fled with him to Evans' relatives in Asphodel township, where they were doubtless married. The old man arrived here in hot haste just two hours too late, and seeing that his efforts to prevent the marriage had failed, gave up further pursuit and returned home.

From Bad to Worse.

She—"I would like to call you by your Christian name, love, but Tom is so hateful and common, you know. Haven't you some pet name?" He—"No-no, I—er—haven't." She "Are you always known as Tom among your friends? He (brightening up) "No, the boys call me 'Shorty.'"

THEY LYNCHED THE OLD MAN.

His Four Daughters Elope, and He Killed Two of Their Lovers and Fatally Wounded One of the Girls.

A St. Louis despatch says: The little town of Bolar, in Mercer County, Mo., turns out the following tragic story: Henry Thomas, an old farmer, had four grown daughters named Hattie, Margaret, Nancy and Jane, aged 16, 18, 20 and 22 years respectively. Last Wednesday night Samuel and Charles Hasburn, brothers, procured a ladder and helped Margaret and Jane out of a second-story window of their father's house, and as they were about to elope with the girls the old man appeared on the scene, but too late to prevent their escape. He at once procured the best horse he had and a shotgun, and started in hot pursuit. When about twelve miles from home he overtook the fleeing party. He immediately opened fire on them, killing both the boys and seriously wounding Margaret. After getting nearly home with the girls he was told that the other two, Hattie and Nancy, had eloped with Ned Gleason and Thos. Allison. He at once left the girls he had with him in charge of some neighbors and started after the others. After securing the other two girls without any serious trouble he started back, but when about two miles from home a mob took possession of him and strung him up to a tree. The old man was terribly strict with the girls. He would hardly let them out of his sight, hence the elopements. He always bragged that he would not be bothered with lazy sons-in-law. Public feeling is strongly in favor of the lynching. Margaret died last night.

LYNCHERS AND POLICE

Have a Bloody Fight Over Some Prisoners

A St. Louis despatch says: A special from Fort Worth, Tex., received here late last night, says Sheriff Richardson, of this county, received a telephone message about midnight from Graham, in Young County, to the effect that while a Deputy United States Marshal, with a posse of Graham citizens, was escorting the four Marlow brothers, Buckhart and another man named Pearce to the Parker County jail at Weatherford, the prisoners being indicted for four murders and eight cases of horse theft, a mob of thirty citizens attempted to lynch them. The Marshal and posse defended the prisoners and a terrible fight took place. Two of the Marlow brothers were killed and four of the posse at the first fire. The fight continued, and another one of the Marlows and Pearce were wounded, and another one of the citizens mortally hurt. The prisoners Pearce, Marlow and Buckhart escaped, but all are said to be wounded. The fight took place two and a-half miles from town. It is not known how many of the mob were hurt. A large posse has been made up at Graham and are in pursuit of the fugitives and the members of the mob. Sheriff Richardson has wired the sheriffs at Henrietta, Vernon, Wichita, Cisco, Abilene and Colorado City

To Choose an Orange.

The very sweetest orange and richest is the black or rusty coated fruit. Pick out the dingiest oranges in the box and you will get the best. Another way to choose oranges is by weight. The heaviest are the best, because they have the thinnest skin and more weight of juice. Thick skin oranges are apt to be dry; they either weigh less because of having so much skin, or because of the poverty of the juice in these particular specimens. A slight freezing on the tree causes this condition in otherwise fine fruit. The "kid-glove" oranges are the two varieties of small fruit grown in Florida from stocks respectively brought from China and from Tangiers. They are called "Mandarin" and "Tangerine." They may be eaten without soiling a kid glove, because the skin is loose and the little "gores" or pockets of juice come apart very cleanly and without breaking. All the above applies to Florida oranges. The Jamaica and Havana oranges are much paler yellow, and their juice is usually of more acid quality.

NEARLY all the sweeps in Paris are Italians The funeral of their chief, M. Scazziga, has just taken place at St. Augustin Church with sumptuous solemnity. He came to Paris 60 years ago on foot, "sweeping" his way to the metropolis. He died a millionaire by knocking down soot, and curing smoky chimneys. His charities were proverbial. Two facts in his career: He would never allow any of his employees to work on Sunday, and any stove chimney or fire place that was sick, in a poor man's home, he doctored it gratis. The Pope decorated him with the order of St. Gregory, which ranked him "Cousin," with the Emperor of Austria and the Queen of Spain.

THE London Morning Post has published a story describing the finding at Holyrood Palace a short time ago, of "the remains of a baby wrapped in cloth of gold and marked 'J.,'" and proceeded to suggest that the baby was none other than the real James VI. of Scotland and I. of England. The story, it may be pointed out, has got rather mixed on its way south. The fact is, no such discovery was ever made at Holyrood. About two years or more ago Major Gore Booth discovered the body of a child concealed in the stonework of the castle not far from the entrance to Queen Mary's room. There is no clue to the identity of the child, and none has since been forthcoming. Every visitor to the castle gets the story from the guides, and no mystery is made about the matter.

THE advantage which a good cigar has over a cigarette is that the smoke of the cigar is likely to kill microbes, while that of the cigarette only retards their development. The London Telegraph says editorially: "An eminent physician of Pisa has recently been engaged, we observe, in some experiments undertaken with a view to test the action of tobacco smoke upon micro-organisms. The microbes were subjected to the smoke for about half an hour, during which time three and a half to four and a half grammes of tobacco were consumed. Among the various kinds of tobacco used were the large Virginia cigars, large and small cavour cigars and the best cigarette tobacco. The result showed that tobacco smoke has the effect of wholly preventing the development of some micro-organisms and of retarding that of others. The Virginia cigar seemed to have the most powerful result, while cigarette smoke had only a retarding influence, and did not entirely check the growth of any form." If, therefore, you want to be healthy—most diseases being the product of microbes, as Dr. Flint stated in the Forum—why, smoke cigars and swear off from cigarettes.

THOSE who complain of the amount of fiction taken out of public libraries should remember how frequently the most important questions have been forced home upon the public mind in the form of fiction—this arresting attention, and other inquiry and action coming afterward. No one will ever be able to compute just how much was contributed by "Uncle Tom's Cabin" to the fall of slavery. The late Mrs. Helen Jackson (H. H.) worked hard in libraries for a whole winter over her compilation "A Century of Dishonor," and when it was fairly published, and a copy sent to every member of Congress, she felt that all she could do to right the wrongs of the Indian had been done. Yet it failed to produce the impression on the public mind which she had desired; and she then wrote, at a white heat, and with a rapidity and facility which she compared to inspiration, the novel of "Ramona;" and this time the work was accomplished. Her utmost dream of success for the book was of a circulation of 10,000 or 15,000; but it has now got up to 75,000, and is still steadily selling. Schools, societies, villages and even drawing-room cars have been named after its heroine, and it has unquestionably done more than any other single influence to reach the public mind. The recent religious novels have brought anew the problems of theology before all. And the very latest illustration of this work of fiction, as a sort of moral breaking-up plough for thought and knowledge, is to be seen in the clubs which are said to be forming to study the problems presented by Mr. Edw. Bellamy's novel, "Looking Backward." The object of this ingenious story is to portray the condition of life in the year 2000, supposing that the existing tendencies of legislation are carried farther and farther, and government becomes more "paternal" in its character.

SEVERAL glass factories now cut the large cylinders of window glass by encircling the cylinder with a fine wire, which is then heated to redness by an electric current, and a drop of water being allowed to fall upon the hot glass, a perfectly clean cut is obtained. THE total number of murders committed in the United States, as reported by telegraph to the Chicago Tribune during 1888 is 2,184, as compared with 2,335 in 1887, 1,499 in 1886 and 1,808 in 1885. The cause of these murders may be classified as follows:

Quarrels	1,033	Resisting arrest	64
Unknown	247	Self-defense	38
Jealousy	214	Infanticide	66
Liquor	19	Riots	34

THE "Statistical Abstract of India," which has been issued, contains an estimate of the present population of India. According to the census of 1881, the population of British territory was 198,790,853, and of the native States 55,191,742, giving a total of 253 982,595. The estimated population of Cashmere (which was not included in the census) in 1873 was 1,500,000; of Upper Burmah in 1886, 3,000 000; and of the Burmese Shan States, 2,000,000. The yearly increment of the population is at least ½ per cent. With these additions, and with allowances for annual increments since the census of February, 1881, the population of India in March, 1887, would be: British territory, 207,754,578; the native States, 60,382,466; giving a total population for all India of 268,137,044. Both in British territory and the native States the number of males is much larger than that of females. In 1881 in British territory there were 1812 males to 97.4 females; and in the native States 28 7 males to 26 4 females; and in all India there were in that year just 6,013,419 more males than females.

MARK TWAIN, who groaned at Adams' grave and let a tear trickle down at the thought of his "forefather" in the cold cold ground, ought to crack his sides over the story that comes from San Domingo concerning the bones of Christopher Columbus. H. C. Astwood is the United States Consul at San Domingo, and, according to La Nacion, of that West Indian capital, he recently shocked Senor Figuero, Dominican Minister of the Interior, by the submission of a Yankee scheme of which this is the gist: "H. M. Linell, American, would guarantee the Dominican Government at least $200,000 a year if said Government would intrust said Linell with the bones of Christopher Columbus for exhibition in the chief cities of the United States. Said bones were to be watched by four Dominican priests and guarded by eight Dominican soldiers, and finally to be restored intact to San Domingo." Very naturally, Minister Figuero and the gentle San Domingo people were scandalized, and now they are said to be about to demand the Consul's recall. "Audacity," say they, "thy name is Astwood!"

A SIEGE OF BURGLARS.

Terrific Commotion and Combat on Chicago's Finest Avenue.

The most fashionable part of Michigan avenue boulevard was wildly excited at 7 o'clock last night E. C. Lewis, an insurance broker, who lives in a handsome house at No. 1,450, had just sat down to dinner when a servant girl rushed in from the kitchen, yelled "Burglars!" and crawled under the table.

Mr. Lewis plunged into the back yard. A low-sized man, dressed in dark clothes, confronted him. The low-sized man pretended to be drunk, and said he "wouldn't go home till morning." Mr. Lewis looked around and saw a ladder which had been raised to an upper window. Mr. Lewis ran into the house and returned with a big gun. As he entered the yard he heard a mocking laugh and saw the low-sized man loping up the alley.

"I'll fool the other one," muttered Mr. Lewis, and he took down the ladder and stored it in the woodshed. Then he went into the house to lock the door. The servant girl thought the burglar had come to scalp her and she hurled herself into the street, screaming.

George Hankins, the ex-gambler, lives next door in a stately mansion. Mr. Hankins has numerous servants. Each of these servants turned in a call for the police. Every other neighbor who had a police call used it. Every other neighbor who didn't have a police call made a noise. Mr. Hankins' coachman climbed over the fence, and George Jones, a druggist's clerk, who had sneaked around to the back door to get the first lick at the burglar, smote the coachman with a baseball bat and chased him down the alley. A boulevard policeman, thinking George and the coachman were the burglars, started after them. They were met by a patrol wagon full of bluecoats, who fell upon George.

And the burglar? He buttoned up his coat, walked down the front stairs, met one of Mr. Hankins' servant girls at the door, chucked her under the chin, and went home.—Chicago Cor. New York World.

Petticoat Emancipation in Paris.

The Gaulois attacks Mme. Carnot because she suffered Mme. Dieulafoy to appear at her last ball dressed in man's clothes. The Gaulois speaks of a police regulation which forbids ladies to wear such garments, and of a Prefect of Police who ordered it to be put in force at the Opera Comique against Mme. Dieulafoy. The moral which this attack points to is that things are tolerated at the Elysee which the police would not allow at the theatre. It has been decided by a committee of the Chamber of Deputies that there is nothing to prevent ladies who find men's attire convenient from wearing it. Mme. Dieulafoy is a very exceptional person, and her life not only above the breath of scandal, but in the highest degree honorable. The Louvre owes to her its Persian collection. At the opening of the Persian Museum there she received Mme. Carnot in the suit which she found so convenient when she was excavating the earth mounds at Shushan. She emancipated herself from petticoats for the first time in 1870 to follow the army of the Loire, in which her husband was serving as a volunteer. At Shushan, when she went there to excavate, she arranged for herself an easy kind of man's suit, and on her return to Paris she found it impossible to revert to, as it seemed to her, the less convenient garments of her sex.—London Daily News.

Bible Scenes Still Enacted.

In writing from Fayal, one of the Azores Islands, a correspondent of the Boston Transcript says: On the country roads and near the wind-mills you will see circular thrashing floors made of hardened pumice stone. When cows and oxen are driven over the grain, crossing and recrossing it, these are a distinct and frequent feature in the landscape, and reminds one of Bible scenes. What is that strange noise I hear from afar? I say to my native companion. Why, its an ox cart coming along the lane with a load of grain. I watch and wait, and within half an hour it passes, with its two or three yoke of oxen dragging this uncouth cart with its high encircling wicker front and sides. Its great solid wooden wheels creak and groan. One is impelled to be merciful and beseech the owner to oil the wheels. But no, I must not, and am told that this noise is a part of the equipage, and no farmer is satisfied unless his wheels have the proper amount of squeak. A law was once made by the Portuguese Government that no creaking cart should be allowed to enter a city, but the people rebelled and the law was repealed.

A BURGLAR'S CLEVER EXPEDIENT.

Policeman Seized by Bulldogs.

A woman named Catherine Barragan was charged at Bow Street Police Court, London, the other day with aiding in a burglary in an optician's shop in Holborn. Evidence was given to the effect that detectives went to prisoner's residence, and there found several opera glasses and barometers. Whilst there a man came in, whom they charged with complicity, and on searching him found a barometer in his pocket. He said he had just bought it over the way. The officers went with him to a shop on the opposite side of the street. The man went behind the counter, and suddenly disappeared through a trap-door. Witness immediately followed, and fell into a dark cellar, where he was instantly seized by two bull terriers, who held him while the man made good his escape. Other officers came to the rescue of witness, but it was necessary to beat the dogs off with an iron crowbar before they released their hold. The prisoner was remanded.

Try Not to Cough.

A physician who is connected with an institution which contains many children says: "There is nothing more irritating to a cough than to cough. For some time I had been so fully assured of this that I recently determined, if possible for one minute, at least, to lessen the number of coughs heard in a certain ward in the hospital of the institution. By the promise of rewards and punishments I succeeded in inducing them simply to hold their breath when tempted to cough, and in a little while I was myself surprised to see how some of the children entirely recovered from their disease.

"Constant coughing is precisely like scratching a wound on the outside of the body; so long as it is done the wound will not heal. Let a person, when tempted to cough, draw a long breath and hold it until it warms and soothes every air cell, and some benefit will soon be received from the process. The nitrogen, which is thus refined, acts as an anodyne to the irritated mucous membrane, allaying the desire to cough and giving the throat and lungs a chance to heal. At the same time a suitable medicine will aid nature in her effort to recuperate."

"There are moments when silence prolonged and unbroken
More expressive may be than all words ever spoken."

Look at that wan and wasted woman, once the picture of health, now so pallid. She cannot begin to tell her sufferings, but as from day to day she goes through the house, attending to her many cares, her attenuated form, her white face, her stooping shoulders, her pinched features, all tell that she is a silent martyr to disease. "That Diabolical Apparatus, the stomach," is the energetic phrase which Carlyle applied to his own troublesome organ of digestion. The great essayist was a dyspeptic from his youth, but had he used Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets he might have shaken off the incubus of indigestion, "like a dewdrop from a lion's mane," and there would have been more "sweetness and light" in his writings and his home. All druggists; 25 cents a vial.

The Shoe & Leather Reporter, N. Y., and Shoe & Leather Review, Chicago, the leading trade papers of the U.S. in the Hide line, have sent their representatives to investigate Mr. Page's business, and after a thorough examination and comparison the Reporter gives him this endorsement

"We believe that in extent of light-weight ross material collected and carried, Mr. Page holds the lead of any competitor and that his present stock is the largest held by any house in this country."

And the Review says:

"After a most thorough investigation of Mr Page's business as compared with others in same line, we have become fully satisfied that in a specialty, light-weight stock, he is unquestionably the largest dealer in this country, while in superiority of quality he is confessedly at the head."

QUERY: If Mr. Page's business is the largest in its line in the United States, is it not the best possible proof of his ability to pay highest prices? If he did not do so, would he naturally get more Skins than any of his competitors in the same line?

A Young Lady's Soliloquy.

[The following was published in CHAMBERS JOURNAL more than twenty years ago, yet many are still hopeless by waiting an answer to the question without making an effort to solve it in a practicle way.]

Uselessly, aimlessly drifting thro' life;
What was I born for? For somebody's wife
I'm told by my mother. Well, that being true,
Somebody keeps himself strangely from view.
And if nought but marriage will settle my fate
I believe I shall die in an unsettled state
For, tho' I'm not ugly, pray what woman is?
You might easily find a more beautiful phiz.
And then, as for temper and manner its plain,
He who seeks for perfection will seek here in vain
Nay, in spite of these drawbacks, my heart is perverse,
And I should not feel grateful for better or worse
To take the first body who gracously came
And offered those treasures, his home and his name
I think, then, my chances of marriage are small
But why should I think of such chances at all
My sisters are all of them younger than I
Yet here, there, in the world, and why not let me try
I know not in business I'm not an adept,
Because from all matters of state I'm kept.
But this is the question that troubles my brain
Why am I not trained up to work of some kind?
Uselessly, aimlessly drifting thro' life.
Why should I want to be "somebody's wife?"

A Miraculous Case

Many of our readers have been aware of the fact that for the past two years Bertie Moore, the eleven year-old son of Mr. John Moore, manager of the Toronto Lime Co's. business, and residing at Limehouse, has suffered severely from some complicated nervous trouble. For some part of that time he was confined to his bed unable to help himself, and at others able to get about with the aid of a cane or crutch, the whole of the time suffering severely from pains and weakness in both head and back, and unable to bear anything to touch his head. During the past summer he has been better than for some time previously, but last fall the trouble asserted itself with renewed vigor and he grew worse until the 21st of November he was utterly prostrate and became totally blind. From that time his sufferings became more and more intense until Sunday morning, 30th of December, about seven o'clock, he had a more than usually severe spasm and fell back exhausted and apparently lifeless. He had taken no nourishment for three days and his mother and father, who were watching at his bedside, thought that the final struggle and all the members of the family were called to the sick chamber. In about twenty minutes he took a long breath, moved his head, looked around and said, "Ma, I can see you, I can see you now and my pain is all gone." His parents concluded that the end had come. But he continued: "I prayed to Jesus and he took it all away, my head is all right. You can burn the cane now, I'll need it no more." From that hour to the present he has had neither pain or weakness of any kind, and can now read the smallest print. He has an excellent appetite and the other day walked over half a mile to see a sick neighbor, and yesterday went to Toronto on a visit with his parents. All his faculties have been restored and he is apparently in perfect health. His case is the strangest on record in this section, and is so declared by Dr. Lowry, who has been in attendance from the first, and had associated with him in consultation eminent physicians from Toronto, Hamilton, Guelph and the United States. All pronounce it a miraculous recovery. The entire community unite in thankful congratulations to the parents upon the restoration to health of their beloved boy.

The first snow of the season fell last night, and we are all wishing for a week or two of sleighing. Ten degrees of frost is the coldest it has been, yet. In the neighborhood of meadows cattle have just been taken in for the winter. Not much winter, but we can beat, I was going to say creation, at all events the Dominion for rain.

Diphtheria has claimed six victims in this municipality up to date. The houses in which it is are under quarantine rules. Steam ships at Vancouver are under the same rules with smallpox aboard. Vancouver, it is claimed, has now 10,000 population. Not bad for 3 years' growth.

If all accounts be true the Dominion Lands in the railway belt are being administered in a strange manner. Parties who already hold free homesteads under the Provincial Government are being allowed to preempt another 160 acres under the Dominion Government, although the act provides otherwise.

The late fisheries regulations prohibiting fishing for salmon in fresh waters are something altogether in favor of the canneries, which are all situated near the salt water limit. Indians can fish for their own use. Are they better than white settlers?

Jones, the murderer, who was executed at Westminster on the ninth inst., should not, according to those acquainted with all the circumstances, have been hanged. Six dollars worth of Pacific Coast whiskey was at the bottom of it this time.

To Stop a Horse From Kicking.

If you have a horse that is in the habit of kicking, put him in a narrow stall that has both sides thickly padded. Suspend a sack filled with hay or straw so that it will strike his heels, and let horse and sack fight it out. Be sure to have things arranged so that the horse cannot hurt himself. The sack will be victorious every time, and in the end the horse will absolutely refuse to kick the sack or anything else.

Fire at Eugenia.

On Saturday forenoon, about 11 o'clock, the residence of Thos. Crowe, Eugenia, was discovered to be on fire. The family was away from home at the time. Neighbors flocked to the scene, and succeeded in saving mostly all the articles of furniture down stairs, but the fire had acquired too much headway to be extinguished. The building, which was of frame, was totally destroyed, with all the upstairs contents. The fire is supposed to have started in the kitchen from a defective stovepipe.

We paid our neighboring village of Markdale a visit on Friday. The merchants there were grumbling about stagnation of business. Bro. Rutledge of the Standard pronounced things in his line as booming. Friend Jackman of the same paper has grown a moustache that would do grace to the Marquis of Lorne himself; and that is much superior to the one worn by by Major Middleton. It is the very color of Capt. Anson's of the ex-Governor's staff. We have heard it rumored that Will's moustache has caught on and that he intends to get married. This was decided last (leap) year.

Can't Insert it.

If our correspondent, "Canadian," would couch his language in a more temperate strain, we would be glad to publish his letters. The one now before us, in answer to "Progress" in the Thornbury paper, is anything but moderate in tone and we cannot publish it. Abuse is not argument, and criticism must not descend to abuse. Therefore we feel justified in refusing to print the letter in its present state but would be glad to receive it in a modified form, as "Progress" is one of those gentlemen annexationists who should be "choked off" by fair fighting.

The firm occupy the Mammoth Seed House, corner Front and Jarvis streets, Toronto, (visitors to which are always made welcome), and have an immense establishment, employing 100 hands, and doing business from the Atlantic to the Pacific. We bespeak for this house the patronage of all who are desirous of buying first-class seeds and encouraging Canadian enterprise. Send your address for a catalogue. They are mailed free.

"The Place Where the Old Horse Died."

In the hollow, by the pollard, where the crop is tall and rank,
Of the dock leaf and the nettle growing free,
Where the bramble and the brushwood straggle
blindly o'er the bank,
And the pyat j-rks and chatters on the tree,
There's a fence I never pass
In the sedges and the grass,
But for very shame I turn my head aside,
While the tears come thick and hot,
And my curse is on the spot—
'Tis the place where the old horse died.

There's his hoof upon the chimney, there's his hide upon the chair,
A better never bent him to the rein;
Now, for all my love and care, I've an empty stall and bare.
I shall never ride my gallant horse again!
How he laid him out at speed,
How he loved to have a lead
How he snorted in his mettle and his pride!
Not a flyer of the hunt
Was beside him in the front.
At the place where the old horse died!

Was he blown? I hardly think it. Did he slip?
I cannot tell.
We had run for forty minutes in the vale,
He was reaching at his bridle, he was going strong and well,
And he never seemed to falter or to fail;
Though I sometimes fancy too,
That his daring spirit knew
The task beyond the compass of his stride;
Yet he faced it, true and brave,
And dropped into his grave.
At the place where the old horse died.

I was up in half a minute, but he never seemed to stir
Though I scored him with my rowels in the fall;
In his life he had not felt before the insult of the spur,
And I know that it was over once for all.
When motionless he lay
In his cheer ess bed of clay,
Huddled up without an effort on his side—
'Twas a hard and bitter stroke,
For his honest back was broke,
At the place where the old horse died.

With a neigh so faint and feeble that it touched me like a groan,
"Farewell, he seemed to murmur, "ere I die;"
Then set his teeth, and stretched his limbs, and so I stood alone,
While the merry chase went heedless sweeping by.
Am I womanly and weak
If the tear was on my cheek
For a brotherhood that death could thus divide?
If, sickened and amazed,
Through a woeful mist I gazed,
On the place where the old horse died.

There are men both good and wise who hold that, in a future state,
Dumb creatures we have cherished here
Shall give us joyous greeting when we pass the golden gate;
Is it folly that I hope it may be so?
For never man had friend
More enduring to the end,
Truer mate in every turn of time and tide;
Could I think we'd meet again,
It would lighten half my pain
At the place where the old horse died.

—Whyte Melville.

ESTELLE'S INFATUATION:

A NOVEL.

CHAPTER V.

THE MOUSE AND THE LION.

The big estates of landed proprietors, where neither coal nor iron has been found, where no new towns have sprung up, and the semi-detached villas dear to the jerry builder are as yet unknown, do not represent their former income nor consideration. Farms are no longer fortunes, and fields do little more than pay for themselves.

The Earl of Kingshouse was an example of the ruthlessness of the times. There was no possible blame to be found with him and his. They had lived the ordinary lives of ordinary gallant gentlemen, enjoying the sunshine while it lasted, and believing in its everlasting continuance, by direct providential ordering, for their benefit. They had not been spendthrifts of an extravagant kind, and they had not been monstrously vicious. Neither had they come to the front as great generals nor as noted statesmen, though they had been for generations officers in the army and navy, nor had they ended as government officials of high rank after beginning as attaches of very problematic value. Still, the family wealth had slowly decreased both in actual bulk and relative proportions, till, as has been said, the present earl had been forced to let the castle for what rental it would fetch, and live in the Dower House with as much economy as he could command and more modesty than he enjoyed. It was, however, his only hope, but even with this things did not mend, and the red lion couchant, which was their proud family crest, was daily more sharply pinching within that galling net of debt and difficulty drawing ever tighter and tighter round it. What was to be done? How from that proverbial stone get the desired blood?

The Kingshouse estate must be still further clipped; and if the foul fiend himself held the shears he must be dealt with as a gentleman and courteously entreated. The estate went up as far as the garden wall of Redhill, and that bit—which my lord could sell without his son's consent—was just what would suit the ex-miner to buy. It was grief and pain to traffic the land, which represented his dignity, for the gold of a man whom, in former days, my lord would not have taken into his service as a groom, nor admitted his son into his house as a shoe-black. But those debts were pressing; money was absolutely necessary, yet as difficult to find as if buried in a pot beneath the rainbow; the Jews were sharks of a more formidable kind than Miles Stagg would be, and that bit of poor land would fetch a good price if the hirsute millionaire, on whose garden wall it abutted, should desire to have it, and so throw out another runner into the rich soil of landed proprietorship.

My lord was no Christian democrat after the pattern of his daughter. On the contrary, he looked at states and principalities as of divine ordination, and held the tamperers therewith as rebels against the express decree of the Almighty—rebels with whom the policeman's truncheon was the only valid argument, and a felon's prison cell the righteous remedy. In this sweeping condemnation, however, he did not include that daughter—his delight, as it has been said he used to call her. Like many other loving and therefore illogical people, love made a line of its own, and allowed a new principle to appear when it touched himself. Had it been Molly, the dairy-maid, for instance, or Mrs. Clanricarde, or even Mrs. Stewart—though as the wife of a clergyman she was officially free of certain philanthropic fads caviare to the million—who had maintained the essential superiority of the human being over the conventional claims of aristocratic gentlehood, he would have consigned any one of them to the eternal perdition for which she had qualified herself. But Lady Elizabeth was different. The inexhaustible fountain of mercy would grant forgiveness for a mistake which in the boundless expanse of knowledge would figure as a virtue—a little awry, and with a kink somewhere in the golden thread; but always a virtue, and to be rewarded as such.

Lord Eustace had told his father of Lady Elizabeth's damaging condescension at the tennis party, and he had himself, with his own aristocratic and august eyes, seen her shake hands with the omad'haun at the church door on the Sunday following. He had seen and wondered, but he had not interfered, partly because of that bit of land which had been weighing on his mind for some time past; partly because he thought that if it was her good pleasure to find any merit in that extraordinary-looking young man called Caleb Stagg—to my lord his very name was enough—if, in the plenitude of her seraphic sweetness, she thought her grace and condescension would in any way, or to the smallest degree, redeem him from the gross burden of his inheritance; well, that was just her goodness warping her intellect. The earl, her father, did not share her belief, and had no part in her choice. Sly is always Sly, and the sty does not breed lions. Nor is it politically desirable to aim at such social or personal transmutation. Morally and religiously, of course, it was all right, but then he was not so moral nor so religious either in a transcendental way as she. Men never are so good as women, and she was better than most women, if he was no worse than the average man. All this gentle playing at providence and philanthropy pleased her, his delight, who took the shine out of them all; and if no one profited, it did no one any harm. Wherefore he merely raised his eyebrows when he saw his daughter's act of condescension before the whole congregation, and said not a word to bring a shade of sorrow on that pure, sweet, holy face, which was to him the dearest thing in life.

Besides, again, my lord had the true English gentleman's feeling with respect to the action of women. He gave them their head up to a certain point; on the one hand, because they were half of his own order, whose status touched his own, and who were therefore entitled to respect as their birthright; on the other, for contempt as to what they might do. The two motives had their common source in pride; which is not wholly bad. When tenderness is superadded, as with my lord for his daughter, the thing takes another complexion, and what was the lofty toleration of contempt becomes the free gift of love recognizing equal moral rights.

All the same, the ex-miner and his family were of a different flesh and blood from the flesh and blood of those born in the purple, in my lord's estimate of human value; and his dear delight's undoubted virtue had as undoubtedly a queer twist in it somewhere.

It was a proud day for Miles Stagg when my lord's agent wrote to him, offering him that parcel of land known as the Redhill Braes for such and such a sum; which, truth to say, was about three times its market value. One-third had been added because of that abutment of the garden wall; the other, because it was the Earl of Kingshouse who opened negotiations at second hand with Miles Stagg, the ex-miner; the third, was the solid base line of which these other two made the sides of the triangle.

Without a trace of snobbishness in his rough-hewn character, Miles could not be indifferent to such topsy-turvydom of conditions as was implied in this offer. It was simply human nature that he should be proud of the consciousness that he, only a few years ago a mere day-laborer, earning his twenty to thirty shillings a week, should now be able to help my lord, who was like a little god among them all.

"Proud! ay, that was he, surely," as he said to Nancy, who was partly dazed and partly frightened by the event.

And yet he felt sorry—almost ashamed—that the great and powerful should be so humbled and brought so far low. He would rather have negotiated for Lady Elizabeth's hand on the more equal terms of money for rank, and as good a lad as ever stepped for a likely lady's husband and the father of her lady ship's bairns. That would have been a fair exchange and no robbery, he said; but this offer of a parcel of poor land for three times its market value was such a confession of need. It made him downright sorry for the grand old family, and he was no wise minded to sniff at the evident extortion, nor would he haggle over the price He would pay my lord what he asked, and much good might the brass do him—not said ironically, but in serious earnest.

He, Miles, wanted naught with society for himself, though he was main glad that Caleb should have his whack. He wanted truly to see his lad wedded to a lass with a grand name, so that he should thus be able to found a family, as such wealth as theirs should do. He wanted Lady Elizabeth as his daughter-in-law, but he was not going to put down this on the back of the cheque. Things must come as they would, and Caleb must strike his own seam in his own way, knowing as how his daddy was at his back to second all his efforts.

Hence the bargain was concluded between the horny-handed Croesus and the empty-handed aristocrat on the strictest business footing; and my lord never knew how much he owed to the generosity of the man he generally designated as "that brute" when he spoke of him at all. My lord paid part of his more pressing debts with the ex-miner's money, and the ex-miner wondered what on earth he should do with the land now that he had it, and what good would be the braes to him when they were of none to his lordship.

"They'll do to remind thee, Miles, that a fool and his money's soon parted," said Jim Fisher, striking his long chin.

And Miles answered, with a voice like a fog-horn, "Ay, man, that will they!" laughing as if the loss of so many thousands stood as a huge financial joke.

"The worst bit of land all round the country-side!" continued Jim, always in his quality of Janus-Mentor on the one side and Theraites on the other.

"That's about it, Jim," returned his former mate and present patron.

"Them thistles and ragwort fairly bet my garden," continued Jim. "It takes a man's time to keep down t' weeds as flies over the wall."

"We'll stub 'em up, Jim," said Miles, roughly cheery. "Thou'st got to be glad, man, as I've bought the land. Thy garden 'll be all the cleaner now that I've got my right to the ploughing on t!"

"Ploughing!" repeated Jim, disdainfully; "as if ary a plough as was ever forged would go in among them stones! I think thou'st losing thy eyesight, Miles. Why, t'land is fell-land, top and bottom; and unless ye can stuff pillows with thistle seed, I don't see what ye'll make of it, or where the vally of it lies, nohow."

"We'll see!" said Miles, laughing amain, and slapping his pockets as he was wont when pleased. "If I don't find a vally for the land, tell me my name's not Miles Stagg, and call me Jack Robinson instead."

"Jack-pudding, Jack-fool, Jack-ass! That's what I'll call thee," grumbled Jim, walking back to his turnips as stiff as a soldier on parade, and as sour as an unripe lemon.

But if the purchase of this parcel of land, this part of the great earl's estate, with its rich crop of ragwort and thistles, did not add much to Miles Stagg's essential position as a landed proprietor, still less advance by even a hair's breadth that darling dream of aristocratic alliance which he caressed, as Bottom might have caressed Titania; it touched Caleb's position in the society of the place, and materially improved his questionable holding. It was one thing for this rough and hirsute Sly, this ex-miner Stagg, to have bought Redhill; to have built a hideous new house on the site of the old, dark, tumble-down, inconvenient Elizabethan gem; to have set up "glass" by the acre, and to let surly old Jim Fisher neglect all their potentialities when he had done so; and another thing to buy the braes direct from my lord himself. The former owner of Redhill had been an absentee, holding a coffee plantation in Jamaica, which he could neither leave nor sell, and which did not pay its working expenses, and the house had been let to any one who would take it—now to a shady captain, who, as they said in those parts, "shot the moon" one night when the place had got too hot for him, and now to a farmer who turned the banqueting hall into a granary. Thus the neighborhood had felt no twinge of resentful sympathy for dispossession of an honored holder when Miles Stagg had bought the place, nor disapprobation of the new man's "land grabbing." Nor had it felt personally or locally enriched by the miner's gold which had flowed over the seas and had done no good to any one at home. When it came to the opening of a direct conduit—when my lord lowered his crest so far as to condescend to sell part of the great Kingshouse estate to the former miner, and had got three times its market value for the parcel—then the neighborhood pricked up its ears and rubbed its dry hands together, and wondered if, perchance, any drops of this beautiful golden ointment would ever moisten this and that and the other of those curved and hungry palms.

CHAPTER VI.

STAR OR MOON LIGHT.

The Earl of Kingshouse was devoted to astronomy; the countess to embroidery. Between these two absorptions lay a wide tract of domestic freedom by which Lady Elizabeth profited, no one interfering. Her father, whose favorite pursuit caused him to turn night into day, was asleep when he should have been awake Her mother who had grown indolent in her comparative poverty and seclusion, asked only to be let alone, wrestling with the difficulty of shades and stitches and mourning in completion the annihilation of endeavor. Hence Lady Elizabeth lived her own life emphatically, and carried out to the utmost of which she was capable the philanthropic doctrines which in "Parson Lot's" time would have gone under the name of Christian Socialism. She received whom she would, and did as she would, and the only one who ever dreamed of objecting was her brother Eustace, and he found no audience. His father pooh-poohed him in favor of his delight, and his mother followed suit in favor of her indolence. If Elizabeth really went too far, and did what she ought not, that, proved, would necessitate her own stricter surveillance and more active companionship; and for this the effort would be too great. Of the two, she preferred to be an ostrich rather than a fly, and to stick her head into the sand, seeing nothing rather than to light on a window-pane, looking all ways at once.

Eustace was so fidgety! she said, plaintively, to my lord; and he had always been jealous of Elizabeth. Why could he not let her alone? If she liked to have dirty little children about her, and give them tea and cakes in the park, there was plenty of room and no one suffered. And if she choose to admit this wonderful young man—this hideous young Stagg—and to talk to him as if he were a human being like any other, that was her affair, and no other person's. She, my lady, supposed the girl was not thinking of marrying him, and it was very amiable of her to try to make him less odious than he was; in view of his responsibilities, indeed, it was more than amiable it was meritorious; for assuredly the napkin in which this immense nugget was wrapped left much to be desired on the score of pattern and get-up generally.

By the grace of which reasoning it came about that Lady Elizabeth was unmolested, and Lord Eustace went back to his regiment decidedly not the victor; and Caleb Stagg was made free of those wide and shallow stairs which led up to Lady Elizabeth's quaint and artistically furnished room. This was one of the doors which opened for him in some sense consequent on that sale of Redhill Braes.

Thus it came about that Caleb was really a good deal at the Dower House, which at one time he would rather have gone into a lion's den than enter; and that Lady Elizabeth, taking her mother's view of his responsibilities, and agreeing with her as to the pattern and get-up of the napkin, did what she could to bring this heir to millions somewhat into line with at least the ordinary gentry of the country, and her example influenced others.

It influenced Mrs. Clanricarde perhaps more than any other. Where Lady Elizabeth went, meaner folk might follow, and Mrs. Clanricarde followed so fast as to outrun her pioneer altogether. Her door opened as wide as it would go, and not a week passed without some expression of material interest on the part of the mother of Estelle for the only son of that rough-hewn Croesus of Redhill. But it was uphill work. Between her resolve to domesticate Caleb Stagg and his distress under the process and evident disinclination to submit to it, who would win?

"It shall not be," said the French woman, setting her teeth hard, when she read the young man's refusal to the third invitation she had sent him.

"But if he does not want to come, poor fellow, why ask him, mother?" said Estelle full of compassion for the unhappy creature, whom her mother so amiably persecuted and so humanely distressed.

"It's our duty," said Mrs. Clanricarde, with admirable self-command. "As Lady Elizabeth says, it is such a pity that the owner of such large responsibilities should be so little fitted to the use of them."

"But it makes him so unhappy," said Estelle. "He is just miserable all the time he is here. He gives me the impression of a worm that has been trodden on. I am sure he is far happier with his own people than with us."

"You might be of more use to him than you are, my dear," said Mrs. Clanricarde. "Young people understand each other so much better than they understand us older folks. If you would take him in hand as Lady Elizabeth does, you would perhaps make something of a gentleman of him."

"He seems even more miserable with me than with you," objected Estelle.

"That is because he sees you shrink from him—that you despise him," said her mother.

"No, I do not despise him, mother," returned Estelle, gravely; "that would be uncharitable and unchristian."

"Yes, that is just what it is," said Mrs. Clanricarde, a little eagerly. "It is really uncharitable, really unchristian, Estelle, and I am very sorry to see my daughter cherish such an unholy temper. You know that I am not one of your dreadful democrats, and that I hold to the distinction of classes and all that, but this is quite different from anything of that kind. It is not an ordinary case at all. God has endowed these people with wonderful means either for good or evil—and it is our duty—all of us to do what we can to insure that they shall be for good."

"Yes, I see," said Estelle, slowly.

"So that I hope, my dear, you will be kinder to this poor desolate young man," continued Mrs. Clanricarde, bringing down the hammer of principle once more with a will on the heated iron of sympathy. "You are doing a religious duty, remember, and Lady Elizabeth sets you the good example."

Warmed by her mother's words, and with all her conscience roused, Estelle took heart of grace for her charitable work, and the next time that Caleb Stagg suffered himself to be caught she was so sweet and kind and gentle that her trodden worm scarce knew on what leaf he was resting, nor what bird was singing there in the bushes overhead.

And at this moment Mrs. Clanricarde hated the young millionaire, and would have slain him if she could.

But Estelle was not so passionately discouraged as her mother. She had not the same reasons.

"Poor fellow!" she thought, pityingly. "What a misfortune to be so shy and ungainly! And fancy his being so much afraid of me. As if any one in the world need be afraid of me!"

And then she thought of Charlie Osborne—dear, handsome, well-mannered Charlie, that facile princeps among men, who would do everything better than any one else, and who was the dearest fellow in the world—as beautiful in heart as he was in person—and without a flaw that she, his lover, and, in a manner, his worshipper, could discover. Ah, if mother would only believe in him as he deserved to be believed in, and allow the engagement between them to be openly confessed—standing foursquare on that sound ground of future success—that ground which was to Estelle as true as jasper foundations of the Great City wall!

But mother was inexorable on this point. It was like asking one parched with thirst to eat ham and anchovies, to beseech her, penniless as she was, to allow of a prospective marriage and present engagement between her daughter and Charlie Osborne—burying her one available talent in the earth and planting her best investment in foredoomed failure. It was absurd to ask it; it would be criminal madness to grant it. And there the matter ended, and no more need be said.

Which was but cold comfort for Estelle to carry on her quivering lip when Charlie had urged her to press his claim on Mrs. Clanricarde once again as so often before—when, perhaps, he had written a letter as sad as tears and has warm as living blood, and had had for all reponse a negative as sharp as knives and as cold as it was sharp Then the two poor tortured lovers had nothing for it but to hold each other by the hand, look into each other's beautiful eyes swear to be faithful through life and unto death, and separate in haste—fear of detection mingled with doubt whether they could meet again to-morrow—on Estelle's side, doubled with shame at her deceit. For by this time Charlie was forbidden Les Saules altogether, and all his intercourse with Estelle was contraband from the start to the finish.

And really for a girl who had been properly educated and sagely lectured to have run like a lapwing under cover of a hedge, then suddenly to appear in the garden sauntering up the broad walk, as cool as a cucumber, with eyes yet bright from unshed tears, and lips a little redder than usual by force of being unduly pressed—really to have to stoop to these subterfuges for the sake of a lover as against a mother, is a trial to the conscience of a severe kind!

No wonder, then, to indemnify that mother for this unconfessed infraction of her orders, the poor girl made herself so sweet and gentle to Caleb Stagg that he was sometimes dazed as by a vision of glory, and sometimes made to feel like a bruised worm trodden under foot by a bird of paradise. Then he would plunge into the woods and bury himself out of sight or he would mount the fells and disappear over the other side; and often in these latter days he would lie down with his face turned to the earth, and sob like a child for some strange pain about his heart for which he could give no name nor cause. When in these moods he used to be so still that the birds flew low about him, and the bees buzzed round his hair, losing their way among the heather. Hours would pass while he was in this state, half of trance and half of agony. It seemed to him as if he bore on his heart all the sorrows of the world—as if he and his nature made common cause with death, and joy was blotted out forever. And then sometimes this mood would pass for nothing more intrinsic than the cry of a lark in the sky, or the sunlight shining on a tract of grass of Parnassus or on the bronzed spikes of the bog-asphodel.

Changeable as an April day, he did not know himself at times; and if he did not, still less did his parents. Miles was of the two the more seriously disturbed. He thought his lad was losing such wits as he ever had; but Nancy said it was just dyspepsia—which she pronounced "dishpepsy"—and prescribed peppermint drops as a fine remedy. Then the mood would pass altogether, and not a trace of this deep, if dreamy, sadness would remain. Invitations would come either from the vicarage or from the Clanricardes, from the curate or the doctor, the retired major or the half-pay captain; and Caleb would go to the gatherings with the rest, and be the "cynosure" on more accounts than one. When he had been with Lady Elizabeth he was calmer, more reconciled with himself and life, and fitter for such duties as fell to his share. She had that power over him, which some women possess, of soothing the perturbed spirit, as when a cool hand rests lightly on a fevered brow; and had it not been for her, the poor omad'haun would have found things harder than they were, though why they should be hard at all was a puzzle to him, for which he had no solution handy.

The Redhill miner lad, whom so lately no one had known, was now quite a personage in the place; and though he was as roughly cast and rudely moulded as could well be, he was all the same the Golden Calf to those wanderers in the desert of impecuniosity, and being golden, though a calf, was gently entreated and courteously entertained. Who would not have been? Whose father could and would give three times its market value for a piece of land, bearing mostly ragwort and thistles, and pay the money down, like a man, on the spot, neither discount asked nor objection made? No wonder that he was made much of by the society of Kingshouse! No wonder that he was courted by Mrs. Clanricarde, to whom at this moment Caliban himself, if a millionaire, would have been welcome as a potential son-in-law! and no wonder that, as a consequence, this unwonted excitement was almost too much for him, and, together with other things, disturbed his mental equilibrium somewhat gravely.

pang. It was the birth hour of his soul with the one, of his social humanity with the other. In both he suffered; but the pangs of the latter were unspeakable and unappeasable, while the joys in the former overshadowed the pain. When the soul confesses its sins, is not the very confession self-healing?

And all this time his father added to his anguish by his coarse congratulations whenever he came home from one of those Kingshouse gatherings, his ripe imagination plucking the fruit that was not yet even in the bud when he urged his son to carry the earl's daughter in terms that burnt the poor fellow's heart within him like so much shrivelled parchment.

Meanwhile all this mental torture was hidden from the two who caused it. To Lady Elizabeth poor Caleb was a well-desiring, well-deserving, unformed, but capable creature to instruct and develop; to Estelle he was a human animal to whom, for compassion's sake, she was as gentle as she would have been to a horse or a dog, but with whom she felt no more possibility of comradeship and infinitely less familiarity of affection. Of a truth, it was Beauty and the beast; and the Beast was the sacrifice.

Sometimes a horrible thought crossed Estelle's mind, but it was one so degrading to her mother as well as to herself as to be almost blasphemous. And yet she could not wholly banish it.

Her mother's praises pricked the poor girl like witches' needles. She felt their invisible points and smarted under them, but she had to keep silence. Of what good to cry out? and to whom could she cry? Lady Elizabeth's liking for the Beast—which, by-the-way, seemed to her a kind of madness—sealed her lips to her; and Charlie had enough troubles to bear as things were, she need not to add to them her own share.

Superstitions and Figures.

Virgil tells us that the gods esteemed odd numbers

There were seven wise men in antiquity and seven wonders of the world.

Miraculous powers are supposed to be possessed by the seventh daughter.

Nine grains of wheat laid on a four-leaved clover enables one to see the fairies.

It is an ancient belief that a change in the body of a man occurs every seventh year.

Falstaff says: "They say there is divinity in odd numbers, either by nativity, chance, or death."

The number three was the perfect number of the Pythagoreans, who said it represented the beginning middle and end.

In the Faroe islands there is a superstition that seals cast off their skins every ninth month and assume the human shape.

Among the Chinese heaven is odd, earth is even, and the numbers 1, 3, 5, 7 and 9 belong to heaven, while the digits are of the earth, earthy.

The Siamese have a regard for odd numbers, and insist on having an odd number of doors, windows and rooms in their houses, and that all staircases must have an odd number of steps.

ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

Minister Phelps Entertained by London's Lord Mayor.

A BRILLIANT ASSEMBLAGE.

A last (Thursday) night's London cable says: The farewell banquet given by Lord Mayor Whitehead to Minister Phelps in the Mansion House to night was a great event. Such a representative gathering to honor an ambassador has been seldom witnessed. The brilliant reception consisted of leading representatives of the Government and the financial, ecclesiastical, artistic and theatrical world. Nearly five hundred guests sat down. All the tables were filled. The Egyptian Hall, in which the banquet was given, was beautifully decorated with flags, flowers and trophies. Music was furnished by the Coldstream Guards' Band and the Glee Club. The American airs were cheered entnusiastically. Politics were for the time forgotten, and everybody showed the utmost kindness. It was like a great family gathering. There were no ladies present. The menu was good and the wines were of the hoicest.

The banquet opened by a short grace and chanting, followed by the national anthem.

Among those present were the Lord Mayor, Mr. Phelps, Earl Rosebery, the Lord High Chancellor, Earl Dunraven, Chief Justice Coleridge, Lords Brassey, Bramwell, Hathfield, Lord Esher, Foreign Secretary Ferguson, Right Hon. Mr. Childers, Sir James Hannen, Hon. Leonard Courtney, Sir Andrew Clark, Sir Charles Tupper, Mr. John Morley, Sir Arthur Sullivan, the Historian Lecky, the Mayor of Belfast, the Attorney-General, Bishop of Massachusetts, Sir James Paget, Mr. Ashmead Bartlett, Sir Charles Russell, Mr. Whistler, the artist; Mr. Bancroft, actor; Police Commissioner Munro, Sir Francis DeWinton, Magistrate Montague Williams, Mr. Wilson Barrett, Professor Dacey, Mr. Henry White, Secretary of the American Legation; Mr. Millais, the artist; Mr. W. S. Gilbert, Mr. Edmund Yates, Mr. George Lewis.

The speeches began with Lord Mayor Whitehead proposing the usual toasts of the Royal Family. After the toasts were drunk he spoke a few good words for the Houses of Lords and Commons, but carefully avoided political allusions.

Hon. Leonard Courtney responded for the Commons, and Lord Halsbury responded for the Lords. Then came a song by the choir.

Mr. Whitehead then proposed the health of Mr. Phelps amid loud and prolonged cheers. Mr. Whitehead said the high esteem in which Mr. Phelps was held by the British nation was most satisfactory. It certainly helped America to a closer friendship with England. There have been misunderstandings, but the hearts of both nations still beat true. England will do her best to maintain the friendly relations. In the event of future trouble, they will appeal to the sense of right in a Christian-like spirit of brothers. Mr. Phelps' conduct in official and private life had won him many friends in England.

When Mr. Phelps rose to reply the cheers continued several minutes, and were prolonged into an ovation. He briefly sketched his experiences in England, and dwelt on the evidences of the friendly relations between the United States and Great Britain, and said that with England's greatness apparent on every side, he felt flattered at the array of shining lights in government, science, art, religion and literature around him. He would be a poor American who did not say that America owed its greatest debt to England for literature, art and science. Tremendous applause and cheers followed, and again cheers echoed through the hall when he said the man who makes no mistakes makes nothing. He did not know who would be his successor. He was not in a position to state, but he was certain that he would be an American gentleman. (More cheers.) There were many ways of saying good-bye and farewell, but it was hard to part from so many friends. He was sorry to say good-bye, yet glad to take home to America so many kind remembrances.

Speeches followed from Lord Rosebery, Chief Justice Coleridge, the Lord High Chancellor and Sir Charles Tupper, the Canadian Commissioner, all very complimentary and kindly.

All the morning papers devote long editorials to Mr. Phelps. The Standard, in concluding a long hostile leader, says: We have nothing to say that can be disagreeable to Mr. Phelps personally, but the recent action of the United States Government does seem to us to render the entertainment of last evening to the United States Minister inopportune, if not indecous.

The Times says: The god-speed that we desire to give Mr. and Mrs. Phelps on their departure from this country is not a piece of formal diplomatic courtesy but an interchange of familiar kindness among kinsmen, of which no one else can be reasonably jealous. If he carries away with him a goodly company of happy memories, he leaves as many behind him with all those who have known him here, and we are prepared to welcome his successor as he was welcomed himself, before he was known to us otherwise than as the representative of the United States.

A Coughing Congregation.

Rev. David Dickie, of St. Luke's Parish Church, Glasgow, had just commenced his discourse on a Sunday afternoon recently when he suddenly stopped, and, leaning over the pulpit, said—My brethren, I consider that it is time this coughing should cease. I intended to have spoken before this, but I thought it would stop. It would have been far better if you would have remained in your beds instead of coming here. There are a number of children here also who are coughing too much. You should have kept them at home on a cold day like this instead of bringing them here. It's very aggravating for any minister to stand here and try to preach with such disgraceful coughing going on. I hope that such a practice will be stopped, and that I will not have to speak again.

Will Carleton attributes his escape from early death by consumption to daily and persistent inflation of the lungs with fresh air. He is now 42 years old.

THE PARNELL COMMISSION.

Evidence as to the Moonlighters—Ovation to O'Brien.

A last (Wednesday) night's London cable says: Before the Parnell Commission to-day Dennis Tobin deposed that he was a member of the Kilconnelly band of Moonlighters. He said that when the members of the band were sworn the leader told them that by order of the League tenants who paid their rents were to be raided. The Moonlighters were ranged in divisions, each division receiving orders from a captain, who also furnished the men with arms. The arms were hidden when not in use. The Moonlighters were paid for committing outrages. Witness' set received £5 for making a raid on the cattle of an obnoxious farmer, and at another time they got 7s 6d each for slaughtering cattle on Miss Thompson's farm.

Tobin recounted a succession of similar misdeeds in which he took part, detailing them without exhibiting the smallest sign of regret. His evidence regarding Moonlighters differed from that of other informers, who have generally described the raiders as fortuitous unrelated groups. Tobin alleges that the Kerry Moonlighters were an organized body, working under recognized rules and with a specific constitution.

Cross-examined by Mr. Michael Davitt, the witness said that the raids were not made for the purpose of getting cheap beef. They were moonlight affairs under order. He had been in prison for assault, but had never been convicted of theft. He was under police protection, but he denied that his evidence was the result of police suggestion.

A London cable says: At the session of the Parnell Commission yesterday Inspector Rogers deposed that he searched the house of Mary O'Connor, Secretary of the Ladies' Land League at Athlone, and found letters from Anna Parnell regarding the formation of a ladies' branch for the relief of evicted tenants. Miss O'Connor's accounts disclosed expenditures for the defence of prisoners charged with outrages.

Sir Henry James announced that he intended to read extracts from speeches.

Sir Charles Russell wanted all of Mr. Parnell's speeches read, not extracts.

Justice Hannen, seeing that Sir Henry had a pile of speeches a foot high, entreated counsel to consider how to shorten the reading.

Sir Henry read extracts from a speech by Mr. Biggar in October, 1880. Mr. Biggar said he would not have extracts. He was anxious to hear the whole speech, which was well worth hearing. (Laughter.)

Sir Charles emphasized Mr. Biggar's desire, and Sir Henry acceded. After reading a while his voice failed, and he was relieved by Mr. Lockwood, of the Parnellite counsel.

Prosecutors Over-reach Themselves.

So far as public opinion is concerned, an investigation unduly prolonged has little or no moral weight. The common sense of the average man tells him that what cannot be proved in a reasonable time cannot be proved at all. If the London Times, with half-a-dozen leading counsel and a small array of detectives, cannot connect Parnell with Irish outrages, either there was no connection or the connection cannot be shown.—Canada Presbyterian.

A Penniless Nobleman's Romance.

A young Polish nobleman, Anthony Sadowsky, who recently arrived, was detained at Castle Garden, New York, because he had no money. Yesterday he received a money order for $100, signed Cleopatra Fleigh, Troy, N.Y. He had met the young lady aboard and was smitten. The lady's father is Samuel Fleigh, a wealthy citizen of Chicago. Sadowsky left last night to meet the lady. She was visiting in Troy.

What Mrs. Chamberlain Wore.

Mr. Chamberlain's American bride, at the Birmingham reception, was dressed with much simplicity and taste in a robe of pale pink corded silk, with a plain body and festooned skirt. The dress was set off with a bow of satin ribbon of the same color, worn on the right shoulder; and for ornaments she wore upon a close coiffure a crescent of sapphires and diamonds, upon the left breast a diamond star and around the neck a string of diamonds.

Terms to Suit.

Gentleman (to man digging a grave)—"What do you get for such a job as that, my friend?"

Gravedigger—"It all depends upon the man who is to be laid in it. If he's a poor man I make it aisy for him, but to a gintleman like you, sorr, it would cost a good deal more, for you wouldn't miss the money."—Utica Observer.

A Terrible Disappointment.

Mother—"Why, my dear, what's the matter? Something has happened at Mrs. De Music's party, I know. Tell me all about it, my child." Daughter—"Boo-hoo! Mrs. De Music asked me to play and when I told her I was out of practice she said she was so sorry, and didn't ask me again. Boo-hoo-hoo!"

Pastor McAnally's Day's Work.

Shelby County has a minister who for usefulness breaks the record. In one day last week the Rev. Charles McAnally preached two sermons, married two couples and set three broken ribs.—Shelbina, Mo., Torchlight.

Chas. Lumsdaller was arrested at Port Townsend, W. T., on Wednesday, charged with murdering his first wife at Fergus Falls, Minn., a year ago. She was poisoned. After her death he married a servant girl with whom he had been intimate, borrowed all the money he could, and, with his family, went to Port Townsend. The whereabouts of Lumsdaller were revealed by O. Larson, of Fergus Falls, who fled to this territory after stealing $2,500, and who was arrested last week.

A special from Monroe County, Ind., says Mrs. Lou Wright received several threatening letters from unknown parties, traceable to idle gossip about her character previous to marriage. Last night six masked men crowded into her house. Her husband was compelled to go to bed, and two men stood guard over him. The others dragged the wife outside and beat her with switches. Her back and legs were covered with large welts. The outrage will be investigated.

THE WHITECHAPEL MURDERER

Jack the Ripper Said to be Ripping up Women in Jamaica.

A last (Wednesday) night's New York despatch says: The Sun says that the crews of the various steamers plying between this city and Kingston, Jamaica, are telling fearful stories of crimes committed in Spanishtown, a village near Kingston. The first of a series of diabolical and mysterious murders took place, so the sailors say, Nov. 28th, 1888, in St. Catharine's parish, a few miles distant from Spanishtown. The victim was a negress of the lowest and most vicious class, whose name has never been discovered. She was found early in the morning lying in a fence corner by the roadside, her throat cut from ear to ear, her cheeks, nose and forehead slashed in a manner that would indicate it to be the work of a skilful butcher.

Her clothing had, as in the case of nearly all the Whitechapel murders, been thrown over her head, and the little crowd which had gathered there upon the discovery of the body were horrified to see that it had been mutilated exactly as had been done in the London cases. If anything further had been needed to make the horror-stricken crowd attribute the crime to the Whitechapel fiend, it was found in a card pinned to the unfortunate woman's body by the blade of a small penknife. The card bore this inscription:

"Jack the Ripper. Fourteen more, then I quit."

Of course a diligent search was made for the murderer, but he was not found.

On the morning of Dec. 13th, in a field, lying and partly concealed under an old shed, was found a second body. In this case the woman was a notorious creature of the lowest class, a negress called "Mag." Her wounds were of the same nature as those inflicted upon the other. The authorities made a hurried investigation, and buried the body as speedily as possible, giving no one an opportunity to examine it.

No mention of the crimes was made in the newspapers at the time, the officials endeavoring by every means in their power to hush the matter up and have it talked about as little as possible. No trace was ever found of the murderer, and it was forgotten save by a few of the wretched women who belonged to that class among whom the unfortunates lived.

The third body was found on the Friday before New Year's Day. This time the newspapers were compelled to notice the discovery. The scene of this third murder was about midway between the places where the former discoveries had been made, and the sailors insist that the crime was in every way analogous to the others.

There are comparatively few women of this class about Kingston or Spanishtown, but those who do live there are in a state of abject terror. The murderer has eluded the authorities and the sailors expect to learn of further atrocities on their return.

BROKE THE WORLD'S RECORD.

Story of the Champion Mean Husband, According to a New York Woman.

An Amsterdam, N. Y., special says: An interesting divorce case is in progress in this city. The plaintiff was formerly the beautiful Miss Hattie Williamson. She married Francis Medder, of Fonda, aged 70 years. He is worth $100,000. The union was soon broken. The lady related her experience to the court as follows:

"I had been married only two weeks when my husband began to find fault about my asking him to provide. He got a dozen eggs, left four in a pan, and locked the others up in his book-case. He got a pound of raisins and locked them up, and when he saw fit to give me some he did. He got lard and forbade me to use butter to warm the potatoes. When I asked him for any money he would tell me to go and earn it. One day I wanted some meat. He said: 'Don't get over a pound.' I went out to see what the butcher had. He had lamb chops. I asked him how much they were. He said 20 cents a pound. I told him that I would have to ask Mr. Medder whether I could get any. I did ask him, and he told me he could not pay that price, and that a piece of stewing beef was good enough. He went and got it. Most of the meat he got for the house was liver. He bought a large liver and a heart once, and before the liver was used up the heart spoiled. He said that I left it lying there and spoiled it. When I was cooking he would stand over the stove and say: 'Aren't you putting too much seasoning in there?' The coffee he would make himself, as he could be more economical, he said. His pies he wanted sweetened with molasses. He would not allow washing to be done oftener than once in four weeks. Twice I took it home and once he did his own washing. He gave me $25 the morning he drove me away. I asked him to come and sit down and see that I took nothing that belonged to him. He went to the piano and played 'Yankee Doodle.' I went to packing my things. When I got all through I told him I supposed he was happy now, and he said: 'How can I give you up?' I went on and told him what he had said the night before, and he said I was crazy. I have supported myself since by dressmaking.

Were They Married at All?

A Quebec despatch says: Emma Jane Murphy, the bride of three days' standing, has taken up her residence with the ladies of the General Hospital, pending a decision of the suit instituted for annulling her marriage. The declaration filed in the case sets forth that J. A. Flanagan and herself have always professed the Roman Catholic religion and now belong to that faith. That on the 2nd of January a pretended marriage was celebrated between them by the Rev. A. T. Love, a minister of the Protestant religion, the said marriage being illegal and in contravention of the laws of the country. It was not celebrated openly and no banns were published. The marriage license under which the ceremony took place was, it is claimed, illegal, as no such document can issue for the marriage of persons not professing the Protestant religion. That the pretended marriage took place on the 2nd inst., and she left Flanagan's domicile on the 6th January inst. Now it is reported Flanagan will not press his suit any further, or defend the action for separation at all, and has left for the United States.

EXCITEMENT AT WASHINGTON

Over Germany's High-Handed Dealings at Samoa.

A Washington despatch says: The House Committee on Foreign Affairs yesterday, with only one dissenting vote (that of Mr. Russell, of Massachusetts, who has opposed the resolution from the first), ordered a favorable report to be made upon the Senate resolution relative to European participation in the construction of the Panama Canal. A sub-committee was appointed to consider Samoan affairs, which come before the committee in the shape of correspondence from the State Department, and in resolutions introduced at the last session declaring in favor of interference by our Government to check German aggressions at the Samoan Islands.

Despatches have been received at the State Department from Mr. Pendleton, the American Minister at Berlin, in regard to the Samoan question. Their contents are withheld from publicity, except some of the extracts from German newspapers.

The despatches from Berlin and London regarding the attitude of Germany on the Samoan question were the subject of general discussion here last evening. Secretary Bayard said it would not be proper for him to discuss the subject of the despatches at this time. He did not know who wrote the article in the North German Gazette, consequently he could not assume the statements to be official, and they might prove to be mere newspaper gossip. He said that although Germany may have larger interests in Samoa than the United States, it had no better or later information from that country than the United States. Regarding the statement that Germany would violate no treaty in acquiring ascendancy in Samoa, Mr. Bayard called attention to the declaration concerning the boundaries of the German and English dominions in the West Pacific Ocean, signed at Berlin on April 6th, 1886. Mr. Bayard thought this agreement precluded German acquisitions in Samoa. This declaration defines the boundaries of the possessions of the two countries and provides that neither power will make acquisitions of other territory, nor establish protectorates over any other territory in the West Pacific. The declaration provides that the Navigators (Samoan) Islands, with which Germany, Great Britain and the United States have concluded treaties, the Friendly (Tonga) Islands and the Nine (Savage) Islands shall form a neutral territory.

A London cable says: Commenting on the Samoan affair the Daily News says: "It is extremely important that England should act cordially with America. It is, therefore, the more to be regretted that we had no Minister at Washington. If Lord Salisbury would be a little less humble to Germany and a little more civil to America it would be better for all parties concerned."

A Berlin cable says the Cologne Gazette declared there is no occasion to fear that the excellent relations between Germany and America are in danger of radical change. It says: "Comparatively little importance is to be attached to the last acts of an American Government about to quit office. It is evident that the American Government treats the Samoan question in a spirit hostile to Germany and on a basis of incorrect suppositions. No treaty was ever concluded between Germany, Great Britain and America regarding Samoa. Such a treaty does not exist between Germany and England. The excitement in America is incomprehensible.

The North German Gazette says that the English Cabinet also disclaims co-operation with the Washington Government regarding Samoa.

EATEN BY HOGS.

The Horrible Fate of a Farmer of Allumette Island.

A Kingston despatch says: On Saturday morning, Michael Culleton, who lives on Allumette Island, a little below Chapeau, went out to the barn yard to feed his cattle and do the morning chores. Not returning at his usual hour, his wife, who was getting uneasy at his prolonged absence, went out to see what was detaining her husband and she was horrified to find that the hogs were eating her husband's body and had actually eaten his head off. The poor woman kept away the pigs, while one of the children ran and got assistance from a neighbor about a mile off. Mr. Culleton had been subject to apoplectic fits and the pigs being hungry at the time made their meal off the unfortunate man. The deceased was 54 years of age and leaves behind him a large family.

A Minister Forgets His Sermon.

On Sunday, the 30th ult., an incident of a peculiar nature occurred in Dennistoun Free Church, Glasgow, during the morning service. The Rev. Dr. Stewart, before commencing his discourse (Daniel v. 34), asked the indulgence of the congregation. He said that he had carefully prepared his sermon, but that within the last half hour his memory had become a complete blank. He could not account for it in any way, as otherwise he felt in perfect health. It was the first time during a ministry extending over a period of twenty-eight years that he had appeared before his congregation with an apology for not being in a position to deliver his discourse. He had notes with him, but not being in the habit of reading his sermon he was unable to see how he would be able to get through it. The rev. doctor thereafter proceeded to read from his notes, but it was observed that he was very much embarrassed. At the conclusion the doctor remarked that he felt better, and asked the congregation to join with him in praying that the affliction with which he had been so suddenly visited might be speedily removed. It need hardly be mentioned that the incident created a profound sensation amongst the congregation.

On Tuesday a foolhardy youth attached his sleigh to the Kingston & Pembroke express train, and was whirled at the rate of forty-five miles an hour from Wilbur to Lavant on a down grade. Witnesses to the ride say all that could be seen was a cloud of snow flying many feet into the air. The youth, who is about 20 years of age, got off the sleigh in a dazed state at Lavant and remarked to the conductor: "I have the bulge on you. Collect your fare if you can."

MYSTERIOUS SPIRIT RAPS.

Strange and Weird Sounds Whose Origin Cannot be Discerned.

A special despatch from Portsmouth, O., to the Cincinnati Commercial relates the following curious story: People dwelling on the Cemetery road, just north of this city, have been existing in an atmosphere of the most intense excitement for the past two weeks, and each night only seems to increase the cause for manifestations of wonderment, if not actual alarm.

Just opposite the main entrance to the cemetery lives a family named Johnson, the head of which, Josiah Johnson, a man of considerable note, died a few months since. The wife and children continued to live at the old house without anything transpiring to cause uneasiness or alarm until at 5 o'clock one morning about two weeks ago, when several members of the household were suddenly awakened by three sharp, loud raps on the window, followed a moment later by the same number of sounds on the door, made as if by knuckles or a light stick. Thinking it some neighbor in whose family there might be a case of sickness, Mrs. Johnson called to know who had knocked. No answer came, and the question was repeated. Still there was silence without, and knowing that no one could have walked away from the door without being heard, the family became alarmed and the daughter was placed at a window where she could plainly observe any one passing from the door to the gate. She remained there until daylight, but saw nothing out of the ordinary. The occurrence caused some uneasiness upon the part of the Johnsons at the time, but this wore away with a day. The following morning, at exactly the same hour, the sounds were heard again, first on the window and then on the door. A member of the family crept to the door to catch any sound from the outside and another one of the household demanded to know who was knocking. No answer came and no sound of any movement was heard. The folks inside were now thoroughly alarmed and kept watch at the window until daylight, as before, but saw no one. Their first impressions were to call in a watch for the following night, but after reflection it was decided to make one more attempt to unravel the mystery.

One of Mrs. Johnson's children is a daughter of 17 years and possessed of unusual courage. She is also an expert with firearms. The following evening this young woman loaded a shotgun and then retired to wait the coming of the strange visitor. The experience of the previous two nights had made the family nervous, and all were awake at an early hour. The young lady stationed herself in front of the door, gun in hand, while another was placed at the window, which was slightly raised, so as to detect any approach from the outside. Scarcely had the parties reached their respective stations when three sharp raps fell upon the window and a moment later were repeated at the door. Miss Johnson immediately threw open the door, but although it was comparatively light outside she could see nothing.

The knocks were repeated on the casing of the door, and then the girl drew the gun and fired in the direction from whence the noise came. The only result was a broken lock and tube. The now thoroughly frightened folks closed and barred the door and awaited daylight. The next day it was determined to call in other parties, and a couple of young men came that evening to watch, thinking the sounds the work of some mischief-maker. At the regular hour the knocks were again repeated, and the men rushed out into the yard, but no one was in sight. These manifestations have kept up right along since that time, always being heard at precisely the same hour. Friday night Will Rhodes and another young man attempted to unravel the mystery by standing guard outside. They took their places shortly after midnight, Rhodes standing by the door with revolver in hand and his partner stationing himself at the window. At the usual time the knocking was heard on the window, followed immediately by loud raps on the door. The door was rapped the second time and then thrown wide open, so that the lamp light from inside streamed out, but nothing out of the ordinary was visible.

Although both men stood right alongside the spot upon which the sound fell they were unable to discern either at the window or door the slightest form.

Woman on Love.

A woman who pretends to laugh at love is like a child who sings at night when he is afraid, and the woman who loves where she ought not—what of her? She scoffs at love while her whole soul is longing to pour its wealth of tenderness upon one who can never be hers. She smiles into his eyes with careless coolness while her heart is praying for one tender glance from him. She treats him at times with studied coldness, and weeps over the necessity when alone. If she is weak, the man eventually discovers her secret. If she is strong, she carries her secret to the grave, and only God knows how dark was her life, and how brave was her fight with that which is dearer than life to most of us.—Mrs. Minnie W. Armstrong in St. Louis Magazine.

Five Ways to Stop a Cold.

1. Bathe the feet in hot water and drink a pint of hot lemonade. Then sponge with salt water and remain in a warm room. 2. Bathe the face in very hot water every five minutes for an hour. 3. Snuff up the nostrils hot salt water every three hours. 4. Inhale ammonia or menthol. 5. Take four hours active exercise in the open air. A ten grain dose of quinine will usually break up a cold in the beginning. Anything that will set the blood actively in circulation will do it, whether it be drugs or the use of a buck-saw. But better than all, if your cold is inveterate or serious, consult your family physician, and at once.

FLESHERTON:

THURSDAY, FEB. 8 1889.

The two parliaments are now in session at Ottawa and Toronto. At Ottawa our members have, as yet, scarcely got down to business. In Toronto the difficulty appears to be that there is not much business to get down to. The thing of most importance which will be likely to come up this season is a revision of the voters' Act, in which, we believe, some radical changes are to be made. Reviewing the works of the present session of Legislature that well informed and trustworthy publication "The Week," speaks of follows:

The chief objects of the opening speech which the Government puts in the hands of the Lieutenant-Governor, are, we suppose, the recount facts accomplished during the recess, and to foreshadow important measures to be summitted during the session. Amongst the former, the victory achieved before the Judicial Committee of the British Privy Council, the organization of the new Department of Agriculture and the Exhibit of Minerals made at the Cincinnati Expositor are the chief. The principal measures promised are a bill to extend the operations of the School of Practical Science, and a new Voters' List Act for the better carrying into effect of the system of Manhood Suffrage, on the "one man, one vote" principle adopted last session. Improvements are also to be attempted in the Factory Act and the Workmen's Compensation for Injuries Act. The Land Titles Act is to be modified, whether in the right direction or not will subsequently appear. Effect will, of course, be given to the agreement reached between the University authorities and the city of Toronto, for the endowment of two additional chairs in the former. This somewhat meagre program will no doubt be considerably enlarged, both by Government and by private measures, as the session proceeds.

At the County Council week before last a vote was taken upon the advisability of memorializing the Government in the matter of granting total prohibition, when it was carried affirmatively by the overwhelming majority of 86 to 9. This evidences the fact that the prohibition question is becoming more and more popular as the ball rolls along.

Speaking of the late debate in the County Council over the County Clerk's salary, the Thornbury Standard of last week says: "The salary Mr. Gale got was in all $700. A few in the County Council, notably Dr. Christoe and a few other gentlemen of that ilk, were clamoring for its reduction." The clerk's salary in reality was only $500, and the duties are so light that a number of candidates thought $306 all it was worth. It would be a council of a funny "ilk" that would pay more for the job than it is worth. The reduction of this salary shows the "clamorous" to be of the proper "ilk," Mr. Standand.

The Toronto World has chopped us off its exchange list. This is hard, very hard! Still, as we did not derive any of our brain food from that source, the blow loses some of its force. We did not miss the rag for nearly a week after it stopped coming. Tra, la, thou concentrated fly-blown essence of meanness, we part company for our mutual benefit. All we kick about is having sent you one miserable year's subscription this fall of $1.50 in connection with this paper. That is what galls!

The Council then adjourned.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Flesherton Station.

Gleamed by our own Reporter.

Moses Oates, Wiggins, and Whittaker, the weather prophets of our town, prophesied we would have an open winter but have taken a back seat for the psesent. Each and all seem to have a merry twinkle in their eyes, since the last fall of snow, as business has returned to its former activity. The amount of timber delivered last week has been far beyond their expectation, and also a fair amount of cordwood and ties. As for grain, the supply is not quite up to the mark.

On Tuesday last Mr. R. Cook and Mr W. Wright, of Flesherton, shipped a car load of cattle and hogs to Toronto.

Mr. A. Hannah has returned from Michigan, and gives a glowing account of that part of Uncle Sam's domain, as far as money making is concerned. We may expect some morning to be minus friend Hannah.

Mr. Knowlton, one of our general storekeepers, who removed to the premises of the late Mr. Purdy, has a well filled store, and has evcrything in apple pie order, and sells cheap, but very few know it for the want of a few posters stating prices, you know what I mean, friend Knowlton.

There is a young farmer not far from here who is somewhat cunning and crafty in his dealings, that same young man had a few dollars to spare, so he thought he would go up to Markdale and buy a few of the necessaries of this life, as he could get them much cheaper there than here. But after having purchased he came home and compared prices with our merchants, which resulted in a loss of two dollars to our far seeing young man. It would have been well for our young friend to have bought a new set of wisdom teeth with the two dollars. What do you think, Archie?

In our town there is a stately, good looking young fellow, who is in the habit now and again of taking a pleasure drive to himself as far west as Squire Ferguson's. On one of his late visits there, forgetful of all things, in coming home he neglected to wrap himself as he was wont to and the result is he has suffered from sore throat and bad cold ever since. Don't you do it again young man, or there may be a funeral.

There is some talk of an entertainment on a grand scale coming off here at no distant day on behalf of Rev. Mr. Watson. May you never weary.

There was a gentleman here one day this week testing a new patent coupler. For being safe and easy to handle, he says that a woman could couple cars with perfect ease. It is so constructed that you have no need to go between the cars when couwling, as it is worked by a lever which projects to the side of the car. The C. P. R., are about purchasing the patent.

The annual Presbyterian congregation meeting was held on Tuesday last, Jan. 29. It was the largest one held for some years. The building committee's statement showed that the church had still an indebtedness of $500, but the prospects are bright for having this wiped off in a short time.

There has not been quite as much curling done here this winter as in former seasons. Still the "stuff" in here, and if Flesherton had sand enough to organize a club we would have great pleasure in wiping them all over the ice. Could you not induce some of your Flesherton people, Mr. Editor, to form a society and offer themselves as a sacrifices to our powerful airms?

The parties who defeated Messrs. McArthur and Riley at curling last week can't do it again, for an oyster supper. At least so the defeated gentlemen say.

Jas. McDonald and John McLean, south line, Artemesia, sawed one cord of wood in an hour on "Boachen's" farm. They want some one to come forward and unto otherwise they will claim the championship.

Mr. Chas. McGinnis, formerley of Glenelg, and cousin of A. McGinnis of Flesherton station, who has been living in the northwest for the last twelve years, died a couple of weeks ago, and the corpse will arrived this week and be interred near his old home. Deceased was a married man, a son of Duncan McGinnis, gravel road, west of Priceville, and was widely and favorably known in this section.

Mr. Hugh McKechnie met with an accident a few days ago. He was going up a ladder to the top of the house to fix the stovepipe, which had got displaced, when his foot slipped and he fell heavily to the ground, from the effect of which he laid in bed for a few days with a sore back. You are too far advanced in years to commence climbing, Hugh.

Mrs. Charles Ferguson of Minto is up on a vist to her mother, who is dangerously ill from nervous prostration.

Mr. Fred Frook, of Walkerton, is spending a few days at his uncle's, Mr. Louis Frook, of Proton. We do not think he has an excellent time as he is helping the boys to saw wood since he came up.

Mr. Dan Ferguson's only daughter has been very ill for some time past. There were two doctors attending her. She is recovering fast, under the good treatment of Dr. Hutton, of Priceville.

Mrs. Joe Campbell has been bedfast for a considerable length of time, but Dr. Mckenzie of Dromore, who is in attendance there expects to bring her around all right through time.

Mr, Dougal Ferguson and Archie are busy drawing logs down to the mill now. They are making good use of the sleighing, as they expect a thaw soon.

Mr. Louis Frook is peddling again. We think he is getting lazy.

Mr. Alex Nevin, one of our worthy citizens, has bade goodbye to single life. He was united in wedlock to Miss Sarah Lomas, of Artemesia, last Wednesday morning, at the residence of Mr. J. Ossums, Priceville. Rev. Mr. McLeod, of Priceville, performed the marriage ceremony, and Mr. J. Ferguson and Miss Mary Ann Mckinnon witnessed the performance. After the knot was tied and a pleasant conversation enjoyed, the happy pair and groomsman and groomsmaid took a drive to Flesherton and put up at Munshaw's hotel, where they stayed for the remainder of the day. But wait till I tell you! As they were passing Watson's blacksmith shop a large crowd assembled on an elevated position in order to have a good look at the newly married couple, and they actually raised their hats and gave three cheers in honor of the occasion, while the bridegroom did not even condescend to cast one single glance toward the admiring spectators. Aye, verily even the dogs bowed, to the great satisfaction of the admiring masters, but to the discomfiture of the couple who rode in the hindmost rig. We cannot help but remark there must be an expert in dog training some place in Priceville. If so we would advise him to advertise in The Advance—"dog training done to order, satisfaction guaranteed or money refunded, for further information apply to Mr. W—, P. P. O."

Miss Christena McDonald and Miss Sarah McDonald are visiting at J. McDonald's, Bentick. They will remain there for some time. We miss their smiling faces, even though they dont stay long.

Mrs. Donald McDonald, of Proton, is confined to her bed from pleurasy. We trust she will soon recover.

EDINBURG.

Waverley station is situated in a valley which was formerly a lake or loch but being drained was laid out as public gardens. A few minutes walk brought us to Princess street, running parallel with this valley which divides the old from the new town. The street being built on the one side only, partakes more of the character of a terrace, and is admittedly one of the finest promenades in Europe. Buildings erected on this side of the valley have flat roofs on a level with Princess street, and the surface of these roofs is laid out as public gardens with walks, fountains, flower beds, shrubs and seats, all open for public use and enjoyment. Seated on one of these near Scot's monument, and refreshing ourselves with some delicious, large, ripe gooseberries, we took in the beauty of the surroundings. Edinburg is remarkable for the number of its monuments, erected in honor of distinguished men, but Scott's monument is surpassingly beautiful and the most elegant type of monumental architecture in the kingdom. It is the form of a gothic spire, rising 200 feet from the street level, with open arches at its base within which is a marble monument of Scott.

We took outside seats on an omnibus for a four miles circular route, comprising the most interesting part of the old city, which, having taken in our next objective point, was the castle. The city is built upon three parallel ridges, the central one terminating on the west by a mass of rock, which is 440 feet above the sea, on the top of which stands Edinburg castle. On the top of the ridge runs the principle street for the distance of a mile. It is called at successive parts or distances different names. Crossing the drawbridge over the moat, and through the old portcullis gate, underneath the old state prison, we were within the castle wall. The entire buildings and fortifications cover several acres. Situated on the highest part of the rock is the old chapel called St. Margaret, dating back some eight hundred years. It was restored from a crumbling ruin through the instrumentality of Professor Sir Daniel Wilson, of Toronto, in 1853. Close to it on the bomb battery is Mons Meg, a gigantic cannon made in Belgrum in 1476. The bore is nearly two feet in diameter. It is not cast but made of thick bars of iron hooped together. In the interior of the castle we saw in the crown room the ancient regalia of Scotland, consisting of crown, sceptre, sword of state, and Lord Treasurer's mace. Adjoining the crown room is Queen Mary's room, a small apartment where James VI. was born. The position of the castle is on a rugged rock perpendicular on all sides except that next the old town is picturesque and romantic. It has many interesting associations and has been the scene of various daring exploits.

> The ponderous wall and massy bar
> Grim rising o'er the rugged rock,
> Have oft withstood assailing war,
> And oft repelled the invaders shock.

The castle can accomodate 200 soldiers and has an armory with space for 3000 stand of arms.

Leaving the castle we commenced a gradual decent of High street towards Holyrood Palace, a mile distant, at the other extremity of the street.

We next visited the Calton Hill, on an eminence overlooking Holy Rood Palace, and rising abruptly to the height of over 350 feet. We had a long steep climb to its summit, but from its grassy slopes we obtained a grand view of the city and surrounding country. There are a number of remarkable monuments erected on this hill, one of which is copied from Parthenon at Athens and adds still more to the remarkable resemblance that Edinburg has to the ancient Grecian capital.

A Grand Valley Elopement.

The greatest excitement prevailed in our usually quiet village last Thursday morning when it became whispered around that a young man named Wm. Buchanan, a son of J. T. Buchanan of this place, and a mason by trade, had eloped with the young and handsome wife of one of our highly respected citizens, Mr. W. J. McCullough, leaving two little children, one three years and the other under one, in care of a little girl who had been living with them, Mr. McCullough having left on Monday to work in the bush up in Proton. On Monday night Buchanan went to the proprietor of the livery stable and hired a rig, saying that he wanted to start away in the night and he would come and get it himself. Mrs. McCullough told the little girl Monday night that she was going to leave early in the morning to go up to the shanty to see her husband. Wednesday evening a note was found in the house, written by Buchanan to Mrs. McCullough and from which it was immediately suspected that they had ran away together. Next morning word was sent up to Mr. McC[illegible]gh, who arrived home in the afternoon completely overcome by the news, and on looking through the house it was found that the runaways had taken a number of things away with them, among the rest all the photographs of herself and family, and a rifle and revolver. Two constables were at once despatched to Fergus, where it was thought they had started for, and it was then ascertained that they had left that place by early train on Tuesday, having left the rig at the station hotel. On Friday two letters were received—one for Mrs. McCullough's mother, and written by Buchanan, and the other from Mrs. McCullough to her husband, both bearing the Windsor postmark—so they have no doubt gone to the other side. Buchanan has left behind several creditors, a greater part of his debts, borrowed money. Even Mrs. McCullough's own relatives and friends say that she had no cause whatever for running away with Buchanan, as Mr. McCullough has always been a loving and faithful husband and even yet is willing to take her back.—Shelburne Economists.

A STRANGE ACCIDENT.—Last week an accident of a very strange nature occurred in town. Mr McArthur had a cow in one stall, and a horse in the adjoining one. The cow had a string hankering after some of the hay in the horse's manger, and to secure some she thrust her tongue through a crack in the boards, to such a length as only an anxious cow can. The horse became suddenly possessed of an appetite for fresh meat, and seeing the protruding tongue instantly seized it and bit a piece off it several inches in length. The cow will probably die.—[Dudalk Herald.

A piece of human scum was drummed out of Beeton the other day and thickly coated with tar and feathers, for indecent conduct. His name was John Williams, alias Samuel Whales. The World, in speaking of it, says: He is no stranger to tar and feathers, having received attention in this way in either Thornbury or Meaford, and in Stayner ridden on a rail. He is credited with three years labor for Her Majesty for attempted rape and it is current talk that this bestial hound defiled his daughters. If this be true Beeton would be well rid of such a human dreg, for the gorge of every resident rises at the thought of such a living emetic being in town.

Walkerton Telescope: On Jan 2nd inst., Mr Martin Drumm, a tinsmith employed with Mr. Havil, of Walkerton, accidently stepped into a vat of boiling water at Anderson & Co's chair factory and literally boiled his right leg from ankle to knee. Mr Editor. Since I wrote we have been blest with a good fall of snow, and the farmers are making good use of it, by the way wood and sawlogs are coming in.

I think the S. A. is nearly fizzled out, as only the captain and two female soldiers were out on march on Friday night last. The soldiers and drum were both about frozen up, by the sound they made.

Sanderson Hudson and R. T. McGirr traded horses on Saturday last, and both got the best of the bargain.

We are glad to hear that George Burk is recovering speedily from his recent illness. So is Mr. Hindle. Dr. Scott seems to have good success among his patients in this vicinity. We wish him success.

There are great preparations being made for the soiree here on Thursday. They are practicing singing, dialogues, and reciting every evening, and it takes the young folks all their time in the evening. J. P. does not get home nights now.

Our tea and organ agent is in town yet and is acting hostler for W. J. McGirr. He has a new pair of duck pants. Times are getting better.

Next week you will get the soiree report.

ONTARIO LEGISLATURE.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

Voters' List, Factory Act and Other Matters to be Legislated On.

A Toronto despatch says: The third session of the present Legislature was opened at 3 o'clock Thursday afternoon, and, as on the previous occasion, was shorn of much of its old-time pomp. There was no booming of cannon, and the Lieutenant-Governor drove from the official residence unaccompanied by martial troopers and escorted only by Commander Law, his aide, who, by the way, has been making himself prominently active in the latest gust of Imperial Federation. The men of "C" Co., School of Infantry, were drawn up at the entrance to the Parliament building, where a crowd of sight-seers, smaller than usual, attempted a faint cheer. Inside the House things were lively enough, although severely plain. The display of uniforms was not so apparent, and indeed there was openly expressed gratification thereat. Mr. Mowat looked smilingly and happy and his colleagues reflected his sunny demeanor. The new Minister from Hamilton was not in his place, and of course will not be until his constituents endorse the appointment. He is in harness just the same, and loaded up with congratulations from all comers without regard to political stripes The Premier's selection in this instance, as viewed by this afternoon's incidents, is a most popular one. The members are not all in by any means, but a day or two will rectify that. The scene when His Honor ascended the dais if not gorgeous was eminently imposing. The following is the full text of

The Speech from the Throne:

Mr. Speaker and Gentlemen of the Legislative Assembly:

I have much pleasure in again welcoming you to your annual duties as representatives of the Province in Parliament assembled.

MR. MOWAT'S LATEST VICTORY.

I congratulate you on the recent decision of the Judicial Committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council confirming the right of the Province to the Crown Lands, including timber and minerals, situated within the Provincial boundaries as declared in 1884 by the decision of their Lordships and the order of Her Majesty in Council. The principal obstacles which have hitherto retarded the settlement and development of our northern territory have thus been removed.

THE NORTHERN BOUNDARY.

I have the pleasure of informing you that there is a fair prospect of our northerly boundary, as well as our westerly boundary, being satisfactorily settled by Imperial statute at the next session of Parliament.

AGRICULTURAL LOOK-OUT.

I am glad to know that the agricultural industries of the country have been fairly prosperous during the past year; that though the early part of the season was unfavorable, and in some localities crops and pastures were badly affected by drouth, yet that over the greater portion of the Province cereals, roots and fruits have been abundant and of superior quality. The extensive areas of land brought under cultivation during the last decade in India, South America, the United States and our own Northwest make economy in production more essential to the farmers of Ontario than ever before, and emphasize the importance of giving increased attention to the best means of promoting the agricultural interests of the country. Increased efficiency has been given by the legislation of last session to the Department of Agriculture throughout all its varied services and experience is already justifying the policy of assigning to the Department a Minister free to devote to it his whole energies.

THE MINING COMMISSION.

Acting upon a recommendation of the House I appointed a Commission last year to inquire into the mineral resources of the Province and the best means for their development. Much valuable information has been gathered by this Commission, and I have reason to believe that already its labors have resulted in drawing a large measure of attention to our mineral wealth. I also deemed it expedient to have the Province represented at the Centennial Exposition of the Ohio Valley and Central States, held at Cincinnati last summer, and having in view the especial importance of attracting foreign enterprise and capital to our mining industry it was determined to confine the exhibit to minerals. There is reason to believe that the object of the exhibit will be to some extent realized in the near future. It is expected that the official reports on both subjects will be completed and ready before the close of the session to be laid before you.

SCHOOL OF PRACTICAL SCIENCE.

With the growth of the Province, and the increasing competition in every department of industry, the necessity for increased skill in the various fields of labor is consequently becoming more urgent. The School of Practical Science, owing to its limited equipment and staff, has so far met the demand inadequately, although the school has been efficient within the field which it has occupied. Measures will be submitted to you for enlarging the staff, increasing the usefulness of the school in reference to mining matters, and extending the curriculum so as to include the study of applied mechanics, applied chemistry and of architecture according to the methods adopted by the best schools of a similar kind in Great Britain and the United States.

PROVINCIAL UNIVERSITY.

An agreement of the city of Toronto to permanently endow two additional chairs in the Provincial University, in settlement of certain litigated questions between the city and the University, will be submitted for your approval and legislative sanction.

OTHER NEW MEASURES.

Amongst the other measures to be submitted for your consideration are: A new Voters' List Act, embodying with the present law, so far as it is applicable, the provisions needed for carrying into full effect the legislation of last session in reference to manhood suffrage, and Bills for increasing the efficiency of the Factory Act and the Workmen's Compensation for Injuries Act, and for further improving the laws respecting land titles and the registration of deeds.

MUNICIPAL LEGISLATION.

A second report of the Municipal Commissioners collects in convenient form a considerable amount of interesting and valuable information regarding municipal matters, and will, I trust, be useful in dealing with the municipal legislation which may be proposed during the present session. This report and all departmental and other usual reports will be laid before you.

ASYLUMS FOR THE INSANE.

During last summer the south wing of the new asylum at Hamilton was completed, and accommodation was thereby afforded for 150 additional patients. For the new cottages at Mimico in connection with the Toronto asylum, a more eligible site than the Government property afforded was obtained in the vicinity through an exchange of land, and a contract was let for building the cottages, for which an appropriation had been granted. Two of the cottages will be ready for occupation before midsummer, and it is confidently expected that the others will be ready before the end of the year.

THE DISPUTED ACCOUNTS.

I regret to say that the accounts between the Dominion and the Province are still unsettled. Since the last session of the Legislature a conference in connection with the accounts took place between the Finance Minister and the Treasurers of Quebec and Ontario. The conference lasted several days, and considerable progress had been made, when the work of the conference was interrupted by the representatives of the Dominion Government taking an entirely new and unexpected position with respect to the interest on the balances a credit of the Provinces, the new contention involving a difference to the Province of a large sum. Representations have since been made to the Dominion Government by the Treasurers of the two Provinces which, I hope, may induce a reconsideration of the matter, and the acquiescence of the Dominion Government in the just demands of the Provinces.

I regret also to say that the questions between this Province and the Province of Quebec are likewise unsettled, the intended arbitration provided for in both Provinces by statute not having been proceeded with, in consequence of a difference as to the matters to be referred. My Government desired that all unsettled matters in dispute should be submitted, and Quebec was not prepared to include the question of the Land Improvement Fund or any matters except such as relate to the school lands. I hope that some satisfactory way of removing the difficulties in the way of a complete settlement may soon be found.

THE PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

of the Province showing the receipts and the expenditures for the past year will be promptly laid before you. I am glad to say that the revenue has exceeded the amount anticipated and that the aggregate expenditure has been kept within the estimates.

The estimates for the expenditure of the current year will at an early date be submitted for your approval. They will be found to have been prepared with all the economy consistent with the efficiency of the public service. I feel sure that your legislative labors in disposing of all matters which may come before you will manifest the same care and wisdom as heretofore.

FRIDAY, The Speaker took the chair at 3 o'clock.

Several petitions praying for the abolition of tax exemptions were presented.

Mr. Mowat said that before the orders of the day were called he had a few words to offer in reference to the recent Ministerial changes. Two Ministers had been taken into the Cabinet since the last meeting of the Legislature, one being the new Minister of Agriculture, who had been appointed to that office under the Act passed last session. It was well known that there were several members of the House who had the necessary qualifications for the office in a very high degree. The Government had selected one of these gentlemen, and from the experience they had since gained of him, they had come to the conclusion that while others perhaps might have fulfilled the duties of the office just as well, it was impossible for any one to have done better. Other changes had arisen from the continued and hopeless illness of their very dear friend and colleague, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, the last of their colleagues who joined the Government in 1872. He was afraid that none of them would ever see Mr. Pardee's face in life again. He was fading away, but it would give satisfaction to the House to know that he did not appear to suffer much. Before the session was over he would have left this world forever, in fact a fatal termination to his malady might occur at any time. More than a year ago Mr. Pardee offered his resignation, believing that his disease was a mortal one, and because he found he was then unable to give that attention to his department which he thought it required. He (Mr. Mowat) had then declined to accept the resignation, as he was extremely reluctant to part with his colleague, knowing how valuable his services has been. The recent decision of the Privy Council in regard to the mineral lands of the northern territory would throw upon the office an enormous amount of increased work, and questions would have to be considered for solution and negotiations entered into which would make it necessary to have a Commissioner of Crown Lands in full vigor to attend to them. Consequently the Government had to come to the conclusion, although with extreme reluctance, that a new Commissioner must be appointed. Mr. Pardee was known as a most kind-hearted man and able Minister, and his intercourse with the public of all classes and creeds had made him universally liked. It was with extreme regret, therefore, that the Government came to the conclusion that the public interests demanded Mr. Pardee's retirement. The next question was what other arrangements should be made for the conduct of the public business. He (Mr. Mowat) had held the view that as the Commissioner of Public Works had administered many of the duties of the Crown Lands Department so well for a length of time, no better arrangement could be devised if he could be induced to assume charge. However, the Government could not prevail upon their hon. friend to exchange his own department for that of the Crown Lands, and the result was that the hon. member for South Brant, the Provincial Secretary, finally consented to accept the office. There was no doubt the hon. gentleman would be able to discharge his new duties conscientiously and in the public interests, and that when he had had the experience of his predecessor he would be found equal to him. This change rendered necessary the appointment of a new Secretary. The name of Provincial Secretary did not convey to the general public any idea of the duties which pertained to the office. Besides the duties of registrar he had many other important duties to discharge. From time to time a great many important duties in connection with the public service had been transferred to from other offices, and perhaps the Government been overloading him with business of various kinds. As a consequence it was found that no new Minister could be expected to discharge all the duties. One of the most important services which the Secretary had in charge was the supervision of the public institutions, such as prisons and asylums. This work was transferred to the Treasurer, who had charge of it before, and had performed the duty satisfactorily. Other duties to which the Treasurer attended, and which could be more quickly learned by a new Minister, were transferred to the Secretary, such as all matters relating to the public health, insurance supervision, auditing of criminal accounts and licenses Then came the question who should fill the new office. After due consideration the Government selected for this purpose the member for Hamilton. The Government believed the selection had been satisfactory to the House and the country. Since the announcement the public journals of both parties had united in expressing their approval. He observed also that Mr. Gibson, who every time he had been elected had to fight an animated contest, was this time likely to be elected without opposition. (Applause.)

Mr. Meredith said that on behalf of the Opposition he concurred in all that the Attorney-General had said in reference to Mr. Pardee. (Applause.) He hoped the day was far distant when party feeling would reach such a state that the good qualities of party opponents should not be recognized. Canada required the best exertions of all her best men, and everything which tended to stimulate her public men in the discharge of their duties should be encouraged. Every one who sat in this House or had the pleasure of the acquaintance of the late Commissioner of Crown Lands would have been happy if, in the public interests, he could have remained in office, and the House felt assured that the Attorney-General interpreted truly the feelings of the members of the Government when he said that the resignation of Mr. Pardee was accepted with extreme reluctance. He (Mr. Meredith) was only too happy to concur in what had been said of the ability of Mr. Pardee, who had always shown he was a man desirous, according to his light, of doing his duty to the country. Mr. Pardee's opponents would be only too ready to admit that he was a fair-minded and honorable combatant in politics. If they should not see him again it would be a matter of general regret to the members of the House. His colleagues would miss him, and the country would miss him. In his affliction Mr. Pardee had the personal sympathy of every member on the Opposition side of the House.

Mr. G. B. Smith, in rising to move the adoption of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, said he wished to refer to a few of the points touched upon in the Lieutenant-Governor's speech. The most extended reference, he said, was made to the question of agriculture, and considering the importance of that industry to this Province and the people at large, the reference was quite justifiable. The number of people engaged in agriculture, and the amount of capital invested, placed it first in the ranks of our industries. If the farmers were prosperous all other classes of the community were also prosperous, and we find even this year, although many of the smaller industries are affected by over-competition, that on the whole the country is prosperous owing to good crops.

Mr. Davis (North York), in seconding the motion, referred to the time honored custom of lightly criticizing the maiden speech of new members. He first touched upon the importance of the exhibit of minerals at the Cincinnati exhibition. He gave a brief outline of the extent of the exhibit, and said that considering our mineral resources it was no wonder that there should have arisen in the minds of many of the people in this Province a desire to have the mineral resources of the Province investigated. He dwelt upon the work of the Mining Commission, and the importance given to the work by the press, and said that there was no doubt but the investigation would bear good fruit, and enlarge the stream of commerce. He gave a brief outline of the past work of the School of Science. It was now proposed to reorganize the school, so as to place it in the first rank with similar schools in other countries. He took up the work of the Bureau of Industries and compared the yield in Ontario to show that it was a mistaken idea for the young men of our country to want to go to the United States, as Ontario compared favorably in the average yield of crops with the neighboring States. Mr. Davis then closed with a dissertation on Home Rule, and also received a tribute of applause.

Mr. Meredith said he had listened with interest and attention to the speeches of both the mover and seconder. The speeches seemed to corroborate what they had heard about in the public press in regard to the change of policy on the part of honorable gentlemen opposite. At one time they had heard much about the deplorable condition of the country and its approaching ruin. He had been glad to hear from the mouth of the mover of the address a refutation of the charges which had been made and he had read with extreme pleasure the report of the Attorney-General's speech at a recent public gathering in Toronto, in which he had come out boldly in defence of the country and of its connection with the Mother Country. The trouble was, that hon. gentlemen opposite showed this patriotism only in spots. He wished the whole mass of their party were permeated with a patriotic spirit. He had hopes, however, that in time they would be found just as patriotic as hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. He remembered how the Provincial Premiers—the crowned heads he might term them—had met at Quebec, at an enormous expense to the country, and had sat down to alter the constitution of the country. They then came to the Legislature and asked them to discuss proposed changes in the constitution of Confederation. Hon. gentlemen opposite had told the House that they intended to go to the foot of the throne itself and ask for a sanction of these changes. What had become of this great Inter-Provincial Conference? Dead and buried. There was not one reference to it in the speech put into the mouth of the Lieutenant-Governor. Seriously speaking, he thought the fact was a justification of the position taken on this side of the House in reference to the matter, and the hon. gentlemen had done well in abandoning their policy. In referring to the decision of the Privy Council Mr. Meredith went on to say that he did not quarrel with that decision, but he thought the hon. gentleman who had touched upon the topic had too generously showered honors upon the Attorney-General, which, he noticed, had caused that gentleman to blush, used even as he was to such laudation. He ventured to think that Ontario had triumphed by reason of the justice of her cause, and that had not the Attorney-General had justice behind him, even his persuasive advocacy would have been of little avail. The Opposition had been charged with wishing to hand over this territory to the Dominion. Why, the party of the hon. gentleman opposite would have been willing to hand over the whole interests of this country to a nation which the Attorney-General had recently described as "hostile." Other causes than that of the National Policy were assigned as contributing to the low prices of agricultural products. He was glad also to find that the Minister of Education proposed to do something in the way of advancing the interests of the great classes of artisans and mechanics. The Opposition would cordially support any measure which would have this effect. With regard to the domestic policy of the Government there were matters which should get attention, but were neglected. Everybody admitted that the present assessment law was a most imperfect one, but what steps had the Government taken to ameliorate this state of things? Not a single one. Then there was the license system. He intended some time during the session to direct more closely the attention of the House and the country to the present system, which he considered demoralizing. He had never denied that there were in the Crooks Act many excellent features. One of these, and the only important one, was the restriction of the licenses. The Government had made use of the temperance sentiment of the country and the good feature of that Act to place the liquor license system of the country under the control of their party. Experience had proved that the law had been administered in a partisan spirit which required the attention of the House. The liquor traffic to-day was entirely under the feet of the Government and their party. When license commissioners were first appointed the Government declared that these men would not be their partizans, but in less than a year every man belonging to the Conservative party was thrust out of office, and now all these license commissioners were partisans with one or two exceptions. Even if there was an honest administration of the law, those engaged in the liquor traffic would be subjected to political influence. But when it was administered in a partisan sense, it became a menace to the country. On the eve of elections men engaged in the liquor traffic have had officers of the law winking at infractions of the law in order that votes might be cast for their candidate or withheld from their opponents. In the interests of the country and the temperance cause there must be a reform in these things, and the House ought to devise some scheme to free this trade from the shackles of partyism. He concurred in the expediency of increasing accommodation for the insane, and advocated increased economy in the service. In returning to the boundary question, he would not dispute the Attorney-General's claim to be considered a great constitutional lawyer, but the hon. gentleman, with all his blandness, always contrived to have the right hand bower up his sleeve. It would appear the Attorney-General did not care to go personally into court in a case unless he was sure of success. But if he would send doubtful cases into court, it might be admitted that it might be the duty of the Dominion Government sometimes to get decisions on doubtful matters.

Mr. Mowat, after expressing his satisfaction with the speeches of the mover and seconder, proceeded to reply to the attack of the leader of the Opposition. In noticing the remarks in reference to loyalty and patriotism, he said the ground the Government had taken was that while the Conservatives talked loyalty their policy was promoting disloyalty. While the Liberal party entertained loyal sentiments, they were endeavoring to make this country the pride of its people, and what they complained of was that the Conservative party had adopted a policy which interfered with the bringing about of this object. The principal part of his hon. friend's remarks had been in reference to the boundary, and he had referred to the Jingo policy of the Government. But did not Sir John say he intended to compel us to give up our rights, and had an army sent from Manitoba to take possession of the country and drive out the Provincial officers? The Government resisted this attempt, and resisted it successfully. Now the Privy Council had declared that the resistance was justified by right. If the Government had not pursued the policy they had the Province would not have obtained the territory at all. His hon. friend admitted that justice was in favor of the Province, and only technical law against it. His hon. friend had taken side with the technical law against justice to his own Province. If both parties had combined on insisting upon the rights of the Province Sir John would never have resisted them. His power to resist arose from the fact that his political friends in Ontario would not defend the rights of their Provinces The Government did not assert that the license system or any system was absolutely free from evils. But the present license system was infinitely superior in any previous system in force in Canada or any other country. It was far superior to any substitute proposed for it He was not surprised that evils had arison, but rather that so few evils had been found. I was a most extraordinary thing, however if the Conservatives were terrorized under this system that there were more Conservatives under license in the Province than there were Reformers. There were some serious disadvantages to the Government in connection with the system. If a man was refused a license, he at once became an enemy of the Government. If a license was taken away because of violation of the law, the culprit became an enemy of the Government, of the system and of the License Commission. There was much in the system which acted unfavorably to the Government. The Government undertook the responsibility unwillingly. The jurisdiction was urged upon them by the temperance people. Having assumed the responsibility the Government had done its best to administer the system as honestly as possible. With regard to the question of economy in the maintenance of the insane, the expense now of the asylum system was less than that of any other Province or any State in the Union.

The Address was then adopted.

Mr. Fraser introduced a Bill to amend the Voters' Lists Act, which was read the first time.

The House adjourned at 5.30 p.m.

MURDER OF A WIDOW.

A Jackson Lady Found with Three Bullets in Her Body.

A last (Friday) night's Jackson, Mich., despatch says: A most ghastly murder was committed here last night. Mrs. Mary H. Latimer, a widow living with her only son, R. Irving Latimer, a druggist, was shot twice in the head after retiring. She evidently crawled out of bed and staggered to the window, but before she could raise it she was shot again, falling backward, and evidently dying in terrible agony. Mrs Latimer was found this morning lying in a pool of blood. Irving Latimer went to Detroit last evening, stating to his clerk that he was going to act as pall-bearer for some deceased friend. Henry Nichols, who was engaged in papering the interior of Mrs. Latimer's house, arrived there at 9 o'clock and found all the doors bolted. He rang the door bell vigorously, when Mrs. Burrow, a neighbor, came to the door and stated that Mrs. Latimer had not appeared at all that morning. Upon going round the house the cellar door was found forced, and Nichols, followed by Mrs. Burrow, went upstairs to the dining-room. The doors were all open, but nothing had been disturbed. Thinking, possibly, Mrs. Latimer was ill, Mrs. Burrow went up to her bedroom while Nichols remained at the foot of the stairs. Opening the door softly Mrs. Burrow saw the bed vacant, and then ventured to open the door wide, calling Mrs. Latimer by name. A scream startled Nichols, who rushed upstairs, when Mrs. Burrow cried: "She's killed! She's murdered!" Mrs. Latimer's husband had been a prominent merchant of Jackson for years. He died about a year ago and left $11,500 life insurance. Of this his widow received $8,000 and the son the remainder.

SOARED AWAY WITH THE ROOSTER.

A Hen Hawk Disregards the Rules of the Cockpit.

A Bridgeport, Conn., despatch says: Linnehan Bros., grocers, of this city, have a pet hen hawk which came into their hands as a chick, and from being petted grew up to be thoroughly domesticated, except for the habit of taking occasional flights in pursuit of prey. These absences never extended beyond a week. A neighbor, who witnessed the meek demeanor of the bird as it lodged on a fence in the back yard of the grocery, offered to match his best gamecock against it in a fight to a finish. The battle took place yesterday afternoon. The gamecock fiercely attacked the hawk, which at first made scarcely a show of resistance. A moment later, however, the hawk woke up and, disdaining such small tactics as picking and striking, seized the game rooster in its talons and soared away beyond the view of the spectators. Neither hawk or rooster has reappeared, and the latter has undoubtedly been eaten by its captor. Peter Handley, owner of the gamecock, not only refuses to pay the amount of the stakes, but threatens to sue Linnenhan Brothers for $50, at which figure he valued his fighting cock.

AN AMERICAN'S VIEW

Of General Wolseley and the British Army.

A London cable says: Gen. S. W. Crawford, who was recently elevated to the position of major-general from the position of military surgeon, has been giving to an interviewer for the Globe his ipse dixit about the personnel of the British army. He criticised the Scots Fusilier Guards as slow and their accoutrements as heavy. Altogether he thinks "that in modern warfare English troops are too heavy, their commissariat too bulky, requiring trains that would surely prove a source of great weakness in a campaign. While this is a striking feature of all the English service, it is especially noticeable in the cavalry, and markedly so in the cavalry of the Guards, where a large proportion of the private's kit is only for the articles necessary in keeping his uniform and accoutrements in order." General Crawford, referring to Lord Wolseley, says: It is but just that I should record the impression I have formed, and that is that Lord Wolseley is as advanced in the application of modern ideas to military life as any general I have known."

Rev. Dr. Rainsford Has a Call.

A Richmond (Va.) despatch says: "It is rumored here that Rev. Dr. William S. Rainsford, of St. George's Church, New York, is considering a call from St. Paul's Church here." It is not at all probable that the rev. gentleman will choose to leave his present charge for a position in the South.

Hans Made it Warm for Them.

An Eau Claire (Wis.) special says: "Hans Kittleson, a farmer residing near Waneka, had a balky team attached to a load of hay. To start them up he built a fire under the team, and the flames consumed the hay, horses, sleigh and all.

About six weeks ago some of Kingsville's enterprising men conceived the idea of boring for gas in that vicinity. They formed a company, secured the services of experts from Ohio and commenced drilling. Yesterday morning they struck gas in paying quantities at a depth of about twelve hundred feet.

To an Electric Light.

Twinkle, twinkle, little Arc,
Sickly, blue, uncertain spark;
Up above my head you swing,
Ugly, strange, expensive thing.

When across the foggy air
Streams the lightning's purple glare,
Does the traveller in the dark
Bless your radiance, little Arc?

When you fade with modest blush,
Scarce more bright than farthing rush,
Would he know which way to go
If you always twinkled so?

Cold, unloving, blinding star,
I've no notion what you are;
How your wondrous "system" works,
Who controls its jumps and jerks?

Yours a lustre like the day?
Ghastly, green, inconstant ray!
No! where'er they worship you
All the world is black or blue.

Though your light perchance surpass
Homely oil or vulgar gas,
Still I close with this remark,
I detest you, little Arc!

The Same Old Story.

"Oh love, my love where art thou now,
My love of long ago?"
No answer to my piteous cry,
And I had loved her so!

We walked beside the rippling brook,
Her hand in mine she laid,
And into her heart I stole a look,
My queenly blue-eyed maid.

I saw what she fain would keep from me,
My face engraven there;
Courageously then I stole a kiss,
And my heart to her laid bare.

I asked her to be my own sweet wife
And with a smile so debonair
She answered, "Love I would with pleasure,
If you were a millionaire!"

Compensation.

When we come to the gates which are each one pearl
Past the waves' wild rush, and the dizzy whirl
Of the Waters of Death, so deep so wide,
And are safe at last on the paradise side,
I think we may see clear written there
O'er the gates, in some heavenly character
For all to read, this beautiful word,
First welcome and pledge to the soul from its Lord.

For life seems so little when life is past,
And the memories of sorrow fleet so fast,
And the woes which were so bitter to you and to me
Shall vanish as rain drops which fall in the sea;
And all that has hurt us shall be made good,
And the puzzles which hindered be understood,
And the long, hard march through the wilderness bare
Seem but a day's journey when once we are there

Each tear we have shed is the seed of a smile;
Our griefs may reappear be after a while;
The doubts turn to surenes, the discords to tune,
And the cold dawn called "Life" into heavenly noon.
The rainbow is cradled in storm, and the snows
Are the sheltering place of the fair, sleeping rose
And, count it with the will of the Lord, soon or late,
We shall read the glad word o'er the beautiful gate.

DEMENTIA AMORIS.

In love, all men are just the same,
Both prodigal and absent-minded.
Let beauty her desire but name,
And common sense at once is blinded
There is no difference in caste,
He may possess a pipe or peerage,
Love is a thing that can't be classed—
It travels cabin style or steerage.

A mild insanity, it seems—
A temporary aberration;
The stricken man, as one who dreams
Is rambling in his conversation.
No need takes he how runs his purse,
To count expenses savors treason,
He buys enough of silly verse
To make young poets lose their reason.

Oh, you who never yet have felt
These symptoms of a happy lover,
Nor to a blushing girl have knelt,
Nor timidly have leaned above her,
A word with you. When you have found
That only one for whom you tarried,
Don't be engaged a twelvemonth round,
And make yourself a dunce. Get married!

The Sleigh Bells.

Jingle, jingle, clear the way,
'Tis the merry, merry sleigh,
As it swiftly souds along
Hear the burst of happy song.
See the gleam of glances bright
Flashing o'er the pathway white.

Jingle, jingle, past it flies,
Sending shafts from hooded eyes—
Roguish archers, I'll be bound,
Little heeding whom they wound:
See them with capricious pranks,
Plowing now the drifted banks.

Jingle, jingle, 'mid the glee,
Who among them cares for me?
Jingle, jingle, on they go,
Capes and bonnets white with snow
Not a single robe they fold
To protect them from the cold.

Jingle, jingle, 'mid the storm,
Fun and frolic keep them warm
Jingle, jingle, down the hills,
O'er the meadows, past the mills
Now 'tis slow and now 'tis fast,
Winter will not always last.
Jingle, jingle, clear the way,
'Tis the merry, merry sleigh.

MARRY OR BE DISMISSED.

Curious Regulations Enforced on the Railroads in Denmark.

Every one who has travelled in Denmark has noticed the tremendous number of guard houses along the railroads, and, in fact, that women usually signal the trains, says a writer in the Philadelphia Press. As a measure of economy man and wife are employed by the State, the former as track walker and the latter as guard. The rules specify the relationship to exist between these two classes of employees, and the rules are made to be obeyed. When it happens that either dies the survivor has just six weeks in which to find another partner. Neglect to do so is disobedience punished by dismissal. The employment of brother, sister or servant to fill the vacancy is not allowed. The guard or track walker must marry in six weeks or leave. A case of the kind occurred recently near the old town of Ribe, on the German frontier. The stricken widower petitioned the Government to allow him an extra week or two, alleging that his work of walking all day along the railroad track did not give him a chance to look for a wife, but his request was refused as in itself an infraction of discipline. The hapless widower had only six days of grace left, but he did not want to lose his job and went skirmishing with such energy that before the end of the fifth he had a new wife flagging the trains.

Mr. Jinks—I don't know how you will feel about it, sir, but the fact is that my wife, your daughter, is a dreadfully hard woman to live with. Mr. Blinks—I can sympathize with you, sir. I married her mother.

MAX ON AMERICA.

O'Rell, the Critic of Peoples, Gives His Views of Brother Jonathan.

American women run their husbands and fathers very close in the matter of wit.

The liberty enjoyed by American girls astonishes the English as much as the liberty of the English girl surprises the French. From the age of 18 the American girl is allowed almost every liberty. She takes the others.

Not to take the name of God in vain, the English have invented many euphemisms; some men, imagining, I suppose, that the Deity takes no cognizance of any language but English, venture so far as to say "Mon Dieu" or "Mein Gott." At this kind of thing the Americans are as clever as the English. They have invented 'Great Scott."

The Americans are Christians—that is to say, they attend church on Sundays. * * * How resist the two following appeals, posted at the doors of a New York and a Chicago church: I copied them word for word with great care:

Musical Evangelists.
Solos.
Short sermons;
The place to be happy and saved.
Walk in, ladies and gentlemen, walk in

The other, more seductive still, was worded thus:

No reason for not coming'
Free seats.
Cheerful services!
Books supplied to the congregation
The public are requested to leave the books in the seats after use.

I saw in an American paper the appearance of Miss Minnie Palmer spoken of in the following terms: "Minnie Palmer will wear all her diamonds in the third act."

The booking office was besieged all day, and, in the evening, money was refused. An amusing detail was the arrival of a good fourth of the audience at 10 o'clock to see the diamonds in the third act.

The population of America is 60,000,000—mostly colonels.

An English old maid would do without her tea before an American woman would go without diamonds.

Oh, those diamonds in America! You see them wherever you go! Not one woman in a hundred will you see without a pair of them in her ears. It is an obession.

Jonathan admires all that glitters, even that which is not gold.

In his eyes the success of a thing answers for its quality, and the charlatanism that succeeds is superior to the merit that vegetates.

The American men are generally thin.

At a dinner party given recently at Delmonico's I heard that each menu had a chain attached, consisting of pearls and diamonds, and valued at $1,000.

Every American with the least self-respect is Colonel or Judge.

Few escape it.

A GENIAL CLERGYMAN.

He Was Not Afraid to Play with the Children.

The late Dean Burgon, though a bachelor, was remarkable for his love of children. It was no uncommon sight to see him dancing in the high street before some delighted little ones or jumping up and down before a perambulator. At a school treat he was in his element, and he would run, jump and play with the children until fairly exhausted. On one occasion he was fairly done up, and could run no more. A crowd of children was standing round him as he sat on the grass. "I can run no more," said the vicar of St. Mary's. Then said a little girl, "All right, you sit still and make faces at us." He did so, and the contortions of his face were truly marvelous and delightful. On another occasion, however, he was not so fortunate. He was always devoted to the children, and upon calling at a house where some of his little friends lived he asked the servant, "Are they up stairs in the drawing-room?" On being told "Yes," he said: "All right, I'll go myself." The servant thereupon left him in the hall. Mr. Burgon then took up a large sheepskin rug and put it over his shoulder. On arriving at the drawing-room door he went down on all his fours, slowly opened the door a little way, and began to groan and roar like a beast; then he advanced a little way into the room, making a hideous noise. Unfortunately for him, none of the children were present, only two visitors staying in the house, who were scared out of their wits by this extraordinary apparition. They screamed loudly and rung the bell violently, thinking a madman was coming. However, a few words of explanation soon put matters to rights.

Dr. Rainsford on Church Defects.

Dr. Rainsford, speaking of one of the weakest spots in modern Protestantism, says: "It does not visibly, by means of its great churches and services, embody any great gospel or Christian idea. Every one knows what the saloon means. The cotton, the produce exchanges embody a very definite idea. So should our churches. They should ever witness to those deepest verities of human nature. In our age, so sorely tempted to selfishness and materialism, the Church should surely stand as an evident witness, first to man's divine nature and consequent need of more than earthly food; second, to man's sonship to God, and hence the due of brotherliness owed by him to all his fellow men, and third, to God's love and good-will to men revealed in the Christ whose words all Christian Churches profess to regard as their law. This weak spot, he says, is the exclusive character of most of our large and fashionable churches, which seem to exist for and are supported almost entirely by the rich people of the community.—Evangelical Churchman.

The Dearest They Must Have.

Says an Englishman: "Many wealthy people in the United States have little artistic taste in the matter of flowers. In ordering flowers for a dinner or a reception they invariably order those which happen for the moment to be the most expensive. If cabbages were the most expensive they would insist on having them, to the exclusion of everything else."—N. Y. Tribune.

They Often Are.

Mrs. Muggins (reading)—Every man gets the wife that heaven intended for him.

Mr. Muggins (musingly)—It must be true, then, that men are punished in this world for their sins.

THE LADIES' COLUMN.

Fashions of a Day.

Tartan hose for ladies in wool or spun silk appear to be coming into favor for wearing with dark gowns.

This year fashion, which in general favors tall, slight figures, seems more thoughtful of those of her votaries who are gifted with a certain amount of embonpoint.

Some of the newest jerseys have watered silk revers and cuffs, or a width of soft silk coming from beneath the arm on the right side, tapering into a point and fastened at the waist on the left side.

Stripes and pekins of all styles are in vogue, garments falling in long lines, redingotes of sober outline, all tending to give length to the figure, and to conceal or attenuate any excess of stoutness.

A magnificent ball dress is of pale, silvery green satin, with long court train lined with old-rose satin, and trimmed with a bordering of Alaska sable, above which are deep arabesques of silver, gold and white embroidery. The front of the skirt is almost solid with the same embroidery.

The petticoats for this season are very tempting. One in black-striped satin and moire had horizontal stripes between the moire, while another had bands of black lace let in, with colored ribbons run through the lace. The flannel petticoats are made with full flounces, elaborately embroidered.

The divided muff is a novelty, and derives its principal merit from that fact, as it is neither very useful nor very ornamental, resembling two cuffs, gathered at the edge to show a contrasting lining, through which the hands pass, connected with a large bow and ends, which ornaments the centre.

Briefs for the Intellect.

Boiled starch makes an excellent paste.

When flat irons become rusty blacken them with stove polish and rub well with a dry brush.

Use charcoal to broil with. The flames close the pores quickly and make the meat very tender.

Silver can be kept bright for months by being placed in an air-tight case with a good sized piece of camphor gum.

For ink spots on floors rub with sand wet with water and oil of vitriol, and afterward rinse with pearline water.

Orange peel, when thoroughly dried or baked, is a capital thing for lighting the fires. It burns fiercely and gives out an intense heat.

Windows can be cleansed in water and the frost entirely removed by using a gill of alcohol to a pint of hot water. Clean quickly and wipe dry with a warm chamois skin.

Large quantities of vegetables should not be stored in a cellar under the house. They will vitiate the air of the whole house and cause sickness. Better have a root cellar or store them in a pit.

A Maine historian says that in old times the fine ladies of Eastport, then a gay, flourishing town, used to acquire beautiful complexions by sleeping with their heads out of the windows in foggy weather.

Cut off the top of an old leg boot or top boot, cut out a piece of the right size, line it with woollen and you will have the best kind of a holder for flat-iron and stove ware—better and safer than old cloth holders.

An All-Round Kisser.

A story is told of a young lady who kissed a baby held in her father's arms; then, in a moment of temporary insanity or abstraction, she stood on tiptoe and kissed the papa. Realizing instantly what a dreadful thing she had done, she wheeled around and kissed the baby's mamma, who was standing near, and retired in good order. Her satirical sister squelched the poor young woman as they left the house by asking her if she didn't want to go back and finish by kissing the hired girl.

Interesting Social Statistics.

Have you any idea how many miles a dancing girl gets over in a single evening? I don't mean a more or less wallflower, or one who sits out her dances—alone or otherwise—but a real lover of waltzing, who dances everything from the beginning to end, and looks almost as fresh at the end of the evening as she did at the beginning. Some man has been attending several dances with a pedometer in his pocket, and he finds that the average distance traversed during an evening of twenty-two dances is 13½ miles! If any girl of one's acquaintance was asked to go an equally long walk, she would just say it was impossible, at least I know I should, but somehow when one has a pleasant partner, good music and a good floor in a well-lighted room, one scarcely stops to consider how much ground one has got over. The average length of one waltz is half a mile, whilst a polka is three-quarters, and even the lancers are a quarter of a mile long. I am going to try and remember these figures—though I am a fearful hand at anything of that sort—so as to entertain my future partners, when I find they are talk-about-the-weather men, with only the music, the floor and the dresses for variety.

The 102nd birthday of Mrs. Lydia Watson, of Leicester, Mass., was celebrated a few days ago.

Two Corean ladies, who are the first to set foot on American soil, are now en route from San Francisco to Washington.

Mme. Lavroffsky, a celebrated Russian chess player, is said to have amassed a fortune by her proficiency in the game.

Mrs. Humphrey Ward has paid heavily for "Robert Elsmere" in the way of ill-health. She has suffered badly from insomnia.

There are about 70,000 lacemakers in Normandy, and in all France there are nearly 200,000 women engaged in this industry.

At the dinner given on Friday evening by Mrs. Stanford at Washington to sixteen of the Senator's friends hot-house strawberries were served that cost $3 a dozen.

When a bride in China knows that she is to be married she must evince by word and manner the deepest melancholy, and she gains commendation and repute if her lamentations are poetical.

An Indiana court has decided that unless a woman is pleased with her photographs she need not pay for them. If, says a crusty bachelor editor, this is law the photographers in that State may as well obscure their cameras at once. Their vocation is gone.

TO MAKE IT SURE OF HEAVEN.

The Reason Given by an Insane Mother for Killing Her Baby.

A Scranton, Pa., despatch says: John Geer, of Buckingham township, Wayne county, left his wife with the baby cooing in her lap as he went to work in the morning. When he returned at noon for dinner the baby was in the cradle, and stretched out on the floor lay its mother, stone dead, with a hideous gash in her throat. When Geer looked at the baby he found that it had been also killed with a knife.

On the table was a letter for him from Mrs. Geer, which said:

I thought I would kill the baby because then it would go to heaven. If I do not do so, I would then not know what might become of it. You need not think it was anything you done that made me do this. I want my ring left on my finger, and I wish my baby laid in my arms and [illegible]

Mrs. Geer had never shown any symptoms of a disordered mind, but her terrible act evidently showed a disordered brain.

An Italian Rival of Mme. Bernhardt.

A Naples correspondent writes: At the Sannazzaro Theatre the Italian rival of Mme. Sarah Bernhardt, Eleonore Duse, has won the sympathies of a critical audience. In the great scene of the third act of "Fedora" she was rapturously applauded and called thrice before the curtain, together with Flavio Ando, who worthily supported her. She wore three magnificent toilettes. In the first act she had on a dress of eau de nil plush. The front breadth was of white brocade embroidered with delicately tinted flowers. The dress was cut low at the neck with a fall of lace; the half sleeves were lace, and she wore a long feathery white boa. The only jewels were two solitaires. In the second act her dress was a white brocade, embroidered with white slightly mixed with gold. In front two large strips of white silk, embroidered with gold, hise two Byzantine sticles. The gown was high-waisted and richly trimmed with lace. In the third act her dress was of crevette-colored silk, entirely covered with white braid, the front of crevette silk, with a tablier of gauze of the same tint. It had a large collar and cuffs, and pockets turned back with copper-colored velvet, and no train. In the last act she appeared in a train dress of dark blue silk, with tunic of very dark blue, embroidered with burnished blue beads. With this dress she wore black gloves.

Why the Bridge Blew Down.

T. M. Griffith, an engineer, writes to the Niagara Falls Gazette on the causes of the wreck of the suspension bridge in the late gale. He says. "I am as well satisfied as if I had seen it just how it acted in the storm. The cables and platform danced up and down, until the motion became so ample that they could no longer be in unison, then the slackened suspenders were jerked in two on the quarters where the vertical motion is greatest, and after a few were broken the rest tore off. My plan of construction is to put in spars on the quarters, floor stays to the same point, and buffers between the end of the platform and towers, and also to build the floor so that it allows all the chance possible for wind to pass through. I lost two bridge platforms before I began to find it necessary to find out the cause. My first Mississippi bridge lost its platform. I sparred and guyed it after that, and it stood some terrible gales."

A Lady's Chances of Marrying.

Every woman has a chance of "catching a husband," but it is conceded that young ladies between 20 and 25 years of age are more likely to draw the matrimonial prizes. However, it is not an unusual thing to hear of the marriage of a lady who has passed the three-quarter century mark. Yet, how can a woman, weak, dispirited, enervated and tormented by disease common to her sex, hope to become a happy wife and mother? Of course she cannot; yet by the magic aid of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription all these obstacles are swept away. As a powerful, invigorating tonic, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription imparts strength to the whole system, and to the womb and its appendages, in particular. Forever-worked, "worn-out," "run-down," debilitated teachers, milliners, dressmakers, seamstresses, "shop-girls," housekeepers, nursing mothers, and feeble women generally, it is the greatest earthly boon, being unequalled as an appetizing cordial and restorative tonic.

In Hard Luck

Mother—What is the matter, my son?

Adult Son—It's all up; no use struggling against fate. I'm bound to land in the poor-house.

"You! Why, my son, you are plumber."

"Yes, but all hope of wealth is gone. My physician has ordered me to live in Southern California. Pipes never burst there."

Popular Women.

Miss Longpurse—Why, of course, Helen of Troy was beautiful. Do you suppose there would have been a twenty-year war over her if she hadn't been beautiful?

Mr. Shortcash (forgetting himself)—Oh, I don't know. Maybe she was rich.

Peculiarities of Car Windows.

Passenger (shivering)—I wish to gracious car windows were made so no woman could get them open.

Conductor (apologetically)—The dry, wintry air takes out the dampness and loosens 'em so they move too easy. They're lighter'n wax in summer.

Sized Him Up.

Doting Mother (inclined to be facetious—"Have you any toys that my boy won't be likely to break in three minutes?"

Dealer (looking the boy over)—"Yes, madam. Step right back to the rubber counter."

A DUNDASITE'S TRAVELS.

Interesting Letter from Richard Talbot from Japan.

Mr. Richard Talbot was for fully fifteen years boss of the weaving room in the Dundas Cotton Factory. When he left he went to the Lybster Cotton Mills at Merritton, where he remained about three years, and since then he has been over a great part of the world as traveller for an English firm. He spent considerable time in Spain and France, and now he is in Japan. The other day his brother, who works in the Cotton Factory here, received a letter from him from Osaka, Japan. We have been permitted to glance through it, and have found it so interesting that we condense it for our readers. The letter is dated Dec. 17th, 1888, and says the writer, after passing thirty days in Yokohama and twenty days in Tokio (the capital), had arrived at Osaka, Japan, 350 miles from Tokio, where he had been ten days. He found in Japan an agreeable climate and an interesting people. Referring to his journey thither from California, he says two Chinamen, returning home, died on board. The doctor seemed jubilant, as he received $20 each for embalming the bodies of the Celestials. The passage on the Pacific was very rough. While travelling from Tokio to Osaka by steamer they had a splendid view of the sacred and very high mountain, Fujihama. It is cone-shaped, built by volcanic action, has a crater at the top, but inactive. It is one of the sights of the world. The top and sides for a long way down are covered with everlasting snows, and its appearance, while grand and majestic, is pleasing to the eye. Thousands, says Mr. Talbot, come and make their devotions to this mountain. He likewise visited Buddhist and Shinto temples, and saw the wooden god of trouble and grief. He saw the people rub parts of the god's body and then with their hand rub themselves on the corresponding portion of their own body. Nose, ears, face, in fact every protuberance originally on the god, had been rubbed smooth by the people who had come to be cured in this way of their bodily and mental ailments. The description of an Osaka temple is interesting. At the far end is the collection box, grated over to prevent people from getting the money thrown into it again, and it is as large as a "temperance platform." Priests were inside making everything right for those who threw their money in. Mr. Talbot was impressed with much that was beautiful in the Buddha and Shinto religions, and he says they inculcate a veneration for ancestors, for national heroes, and that under it children always respect their parents, and infants are carried about in the fresh air and cared for in a remarkable manner. Politeness is racy of the country. Boots must be pulled off when entering a house, and the waiters bow nearly to the ground. Refinement and politeness, says the letter writer, about these people surpasses anything he had seen in Europe. Brief references are made to the worship of the sun and the signification of the symbols used by the Japs in their religious exercises, and the interesting letter closed.—Dundas Standard.

Do Not Think for a Moment that catarrh will in time wear out. The theory is false. Men try to believe it because it would be pleasant if true, but it is not, as all know. Do not let an acute attack of cold in the head remain unsubdued. It is liable to develop into catarrh. You can rid yourself of the cold and avoid all chance of catarrh by using Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy. If already afflicted rid yourself of this troublesome disease speedily by the same means. First Boy—"I hid under the sofa the other evening to listen to what young Smith, would say to my sister." Second Boy—"What did he say?" First Boy—"He only talked about religion and kicked me about twenty times on the head." Second Boy—"He knew you were there, I guess." First Boy—"I'm afraid he suspected it."

The Life Current.

Deprive the vegetable world of moisture and it pales, withers and dies; the whole earth becomes parched, and desolation pervades the landscape. Deprive the human system of pure blood and health is impossible, disease inevitable. The skin becomes charged with repulsive humors, the lungs loaded with foreign secretions, fevers ensue, and, unless speedily arrested, death follows. Renew to healthy action the liver, the great blood-purifying gland, with Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and health flows through every avenue, restoring every organ to vigor. All druggists.

Col. Jacob L. Green, President of the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company, Hartford, announced last evening that Joseph A. Moore, the financial correspondent of the company at Indianapolis, after sixteen years of service, during which he has had unlimited confidence of the directors and officers and of their predecessors, is a defaulter. The extreme amount involved is about $500,000. Moore has restored to the company property which may reduce the actual loss to $400,000. The loss will not affect the company's solvency nor interfere with its dividend.

Mrs. Woodland and daughter of Durham spent a few days with Mrs. M. Richardson during the past week

We have received a copy of the Carnival Number of the Montreal Star. It is a superb number, a grand souvenir to send to distant friends and well worth preserving in private libraries as a memento of the most extraordinary winter in the history of Canada. We cannot describe the number as it is so elaborate. An order has been booked from London, England, for five thousand copies, while in Toronto and New York it has created a tremendous furore. The last edition sent it to any address for the small sum of thirty-five cents.

Methodist Church.

There is quite a perceptible improvement in the Methodist church choir of late. The singing on Sunday was exceptionally good; the voluntary, "Peace be Still," given in the evening was beautifully rendered, and elicited much admiration. The whole service on Sunday evening was grand. Rev. Mr. Shilton's sermon on the casting away of Paul (Acts XXVII) was an exceedingly interesting discourse. There was a large audience present.

The old reliable Farmer's Advocate comes regularly to hand each month, brim full of interesting and instructive matter for the farmer.

Vick's floral guide, the largest, most complete and magnificent seed catalogue published, has been received. It is sent for ten cents. The three colored plates are worth that sum themselves.

Mechanics' Institute.

A subscription list is being circulated with the view to the formation of a mechanics' Institute for Flesherton. It is desirable to raise from fifty to seventy-five dollars in subscriptions, when the Government will add another fifty thereto. An offer has been received from a gentleman in Toronto, who is the possessor of a magnificent library, to sell a portion of his books at fifty per cent off the original prices, and all guaranteed to be in good condition. Of the sum before mentioned more than one half has been subscribed. M. Richardson, Esq., has offered a room free of rent for the library. All these things make prospects bright, and the institute is about to become a fact. Those who desire to become members may hand in their names to J. G Anderson or this office. We will publish a list of the subscribers as soon as it is completed. When the list is finished a meeting of subscribers will be called and a committee appointed to proceed with the matter.

Swanton, and William Davis, the managing committee, for the very pleasant entertainment furnished.

Mr. Ingram—Thursday next—Bill to amend the Assessment Act.

Mr. Harcourt—Thursday next Bill to amend the University Act.

Mr. Garson—From the Plumbers' Assembly, K. of L., of St. Catharines, praying for free school books and other amendments to the school laws ; they also desired legislation for the regulation of stationary engineers, engines and boilers ; the compulsory publication of assessment rolls, and certain amendments to the Factory Act. The Seamen's Assembly of the same organization, of St. Catharines, also petitioned for similar legislation.

Mr. Lees introduced a Bill to amend the General Road Companies Act, which was read the first time.

Mr. Fraser called attention to the fact that the Globe, in endeavoring to give the items of expenditure on the Parliament buildings as shown in the appendix to the report on Public Works, had fallen into the serious error of adding the items to the totals, a process by which they made out the total expenditure to be double what it really was. For the information of the House and the country he might state that the total expenditure on the new Parliament buildings to the 31st December, 1888, was $308,646. Of this sum Mr. Yorke, the contractor, had taken $244,313 for masonry, $80,531 for carpentering, etc., $12,031 for bricks. The St. Lawrence foundry had taken under their contract $10,019 for iron, and Mr. Waite, the architect, had been paid $12,500. With miscellaneous expenses, these items made up the total of $308,000 in round numbers.

NOTICES OF MOTION.

Mr. Morin—On Friday next—Order of the House showing the number of persons who have visited the Queen Victoria Niagara Falls Park during the year 1888 ; also showing the number who have paid for admission to the islands in said park, giving the amount of revenue derived from that source ; also showing the amount of revenue derived from all other sources during the year ; also showing the amount paid as expenses for the management of said park, giving the names of the officials and the amount paid to each ; also giving a statement of the money still on hand derived from the sale of bonds ; also showing the amount of interest paid, and from what source paid.

Mr. French—On Friday next—Inquiry of Ministry—Has the attention of the Attorney-General been drawn to the recent decision of Anderson vs. Glass, confirming the power of practically evading the provisions of the Act respecting assignments and preferences by insolvent persons, which, under sec. 6, requires an assignment to be made to the sheriff or to a person resident in the county? Is any remedy proposed ?

Messrs. Fraser and Evanturel presented to the House Mr. Caldwell, the recently elected member for North Lanark, who, having subscribed to the usual oath and signed the roll, took his seat.

The following petitions were presented :

Mr. Chisholm—From the village of Streetsville, asking that exemptions from taxation be abolished.

Mr. Harcourt—From the Council of the corporation of the county of Haldmand, with the same prayer.

Mr. Awrey—From the county of Wentworth, asking for amendments to the law regarding hawkers and peddlers ; also for amendments to the General Road Companies Act.

Mr. Hardy, Commissioner of Crown Lands, presented to the House a tabulated return of the number of inmates of the public institutions of Ontario, showing the sex, nationality, parentage, religious denomination, etc., of each inmate, to the 30th Sept., 1888. The total number of inmates in all the institutions of the Province was shown to be 4,459, there being 2,443 males and 2,016 females.

The analysis of reports of the County, Township and Horticultural Societies of Ontario for the year 1887, and the report of the Council of the Agriculture and Arts Association of the Province for 1888, were also laid on the table.

The following bills were introduced and read the first time :

Mr. French—An Act to amend the Law of Slander.

Mr. Waters An Act to enable widows and unmarried women to vote for members of the Legislative Assembly.

Mr. Balfour—An Act to amend the Assessment Act.

Mr. Ingram—An Act to amend the Assessment Act.

Mr. Fraser moved the second reading of the Bill respecting voters' lists. He explained that the Bill retained all the present machinery making provision relative to the preparation and revision of the voters' list. The present machinery was simply adapted to the Manhood Suffrage Bill of last session. He had thought that instead of bringing in an amended Act it would be better to incorporate all the laws on the subject in one Act. It was desirable to have the voters' lists ready as soon as possible, and in order to expedite matters the Government intended to ask the House to consent to the printing of a larger number than usual of the Bill, so that the members could send copies to each officer in each riding.

Mr. Meredith said that ordinarily the practice of not taking the second reading of Bills till they were distributed would be adhered to, but in the circumstance he waived his objection, as he understood from his hon. friend that the Bill was a consolidation of existing laws with an adaptation of the existing machinery so as to carry out the manhood suffrage system.

The Bill was read the second time.

Messrs. Mowat and Awrey presented Mr. J. M. Gibson, the newly elected member for Hamilton, who, having taken the oath and signed the roll, took his seat immediately next to that of the Minister of Agriculture.

The following Bills were introduced and read a first time :

Mr. O'Connor—To amend the Assessment Act.

Mr. Clarke (Wellington)—For the better protection of insectivorous and other birds.

Mr. Balfour—To amend the Act respecting the federation of the University of Toronto and University College, and other universities and colleges ; also to amend the Municipal Act.

Mr. Waters—To amend the Assessment Act.

Mr. Fraser moved that the name of Mr. Gibson be added to the Library, Private Bills, Privileges and Elections and Railway Committees. Carried.

The House adjourned at 3.20 p. m.

Warning to Gum Chewers.

A special despatch to the Boston Herald from Harrisburg, Pa., says : The most remarkable case that has come under the observation of the medical fraternity in this city for a long time is that of Mary Yountz, aged 12 years, who is suffering from facial paralysis. This affliction is due to chewing gum, she having employed the use of her jaws so constantly during the last three months that the muscles of her face are powerless, and her nerves are in a dilapidated condition. When she laughs her face presents an amusing sight, and yet there is much sympathy felt for the little miss here, as her condition is regarded as a serious one by the physicians who have been called upon to treat her. In whatever position she is able to twist her mouth the muscles remain, and the face is thus in a distorted shape until one of the members of her family assist her to place it in proper condition with their hands. Her chin drops, and it frequently becomes necessary to tie a bandage over her head to keep the lower jaw in its proper place. Mary is now under the care of Dr. Hiles, who is applying plasters to her face, and under this treatment she seems to be improving, but very slowly. This is the first case of the kind that has been heard of by many of the prominent physicians in this city, and their treatment is much in the order of an experiment. The physicians have been attending her since Tuesday.

SIR RODERICK'S GIRL.

Amusing Case in which a Former Hamiltonian Figured.

THE BARONET CALLS IT BLACKMAIL.

A New York despatch says : Sir Roderick Cameron, a tall, dignified, austere looking representative of Her Majesty's Dominions, a former well-known resident of Hamilton, Ont., who is now a leading New Yorker, appeared in the Court of Sessions to-day as complainant against Joseph I. Clarke, the manager of a morning newspaper, and Miss Emma Meredith, a former servant of his. He charged them with criminal libel.

The civil suit of Miss Meredith against Sir Roderick for wages, which she claimed, he would not pay her, has already been fully told. The paper complained of in reporting the case said : "The only advances Sir Roderick was ready to make to her, the lady asserts, were advances of a nature she could not mention without a blush."

Assistant District Attorney Gunning S. Bedford and Peter B. Olney were there to lay down the law in the interest of Sir Roderick, while Counsellor Wm. F. Howe and Lawyer Dennis Corcoran were there to protect the defendants.

Mr. Howe held forth long and learnedly regarding what did and did not constitute libel in the meaning of the statute, and closed by stating that for Sir Roderick's sake he wished the case dismissed. He said he did not want to subject the venerable gentleman to a "most painful" and "excruciating" cross-examination.

Sir Roderick smiled grimly at Mr. Howe's excessive concern for him, and Justice Kilbreth denied the motion to dismiss.

The complainant then took the witness chair, and Counsellor Howe began to bombard him with questions that soon made him exhibit signs of wrath and perturbation.

"You brought Miss Meredith to this country from England on the steamer Republic in November last to act as school room companion to your youngest daughters, did you not, Mr. Cameron?" inquired Mr. Howe. The witness replied that he did. In answer to further questions he denied that he had ever treated her except with respect, and any assertions to the contrary were absolutely false.

Miss Meredith, who is tall, finely formed and was becomingly dressed, took Sir Roderick's place in the witness chair. She has large gray eyes, full red lips and cheeks and very regular features. Her eyebrows are beautifully curved and her hair is cropped close and inclined to curl.

SIR RODERICK IN TROUSERS AND SHIRT.

In answer to questions she said that on the night of Jan. 3rd, about 8 o'clock, she finished dressing Sir Roderick's daughter Isabella in the dressing-room. It was adjoining his bedroom, and had a door leading from it into Sir Roderick's place of rest. Shortly after the daughter had left the room Sir Roderick came in clad in his trousers and shirt, caught her by the arm and attempted to force her into his apartment. She broke away from him, after telling him "never to dare speak to her again," and ascended to her own room.

Mr. Bedford cross-examined Miss Meredith. She said that after she went to her room Miss Thomas, a maid in the house, came in and to her she "made light" of Sir Roderick's action. She acknowledged that she told the maid Sir Roderick had "flattered her" that evening. He had said she had "very pretty hair."

"When was the first time he (Sir Roderick) made advances toward you ?"

"On the steamer Republic, on the way over, when we were about three days at sea. He put his arm around me and expressed sorrow that I was sick."

"The weather was very boisterous, was it not ?"

"Yes, it was boisterous all the way over. (Much laughter.) Miss Meredith was asked to describe in detail the alleged gallantries, and after a wrangle between the lawyers and the refusal of Judge Kilbreth to hear them in private, did so in a low voice and with blushing cheeks.

Miss Thomas, a tall, spare woman, took the stand and related how Miss Meredith had laughingly told her on the night of Jan. 3rd how Sir Roderick had complimented her on the appearance of her hair. She was with the family abroad and came home with them on the Republic.

"Did you not," asked Mr. Howe, "tell Miss Meredith shortly after she was hired in London that if Sir Roderick made any advances toward her to be firm ?"

"No-o-o, no, sir," stammered the witness. "I made no such remark in regard to Sir Roderick. I might have cautioned her in that way against the male sex in general."

MISS MEREDITH COMPLIMENTED.

Roderick McLeod Cameron, a son of Sir Roderick, swore that on the night of January 3rd, just about the time Miss Meredith says his father appeared before her in trousers and shirt, he came into the drawing room dressed as usual, and said to his daughters : "I have just complimented Miss Meredith on the way she does her hair up. You girls should take lessons from her."

James Lenon next recounted how he and another man met Miss Meredith with Sir Roderick's butler, Mr. Milton, in Patrick D. Eagan's saloon, on Clinton place, where she recited her grievances at great length.

The case was adjourned until Tuesday afternoon next.

Sir Roderick came over to the reporter's table and said he would like publication of the case held over until Butler Milton had testified. He claimed there was an organized attempt to extort money from him.

"I deny everything Miss Meredith has said," said he.

A New York despatch of to-day's date says : The jury in the case of Mary Meridith against Sir Roderick Cameron, the millionaire Australian merchant, living in this city, for three months' wages as children's maid, found a verdict yesterday in favor of Miss Meridith. Sir Roderick had refused the payment on the ground that Miss Meridith had broken a contract to remain a year in his service. During the trial the plaintiff charged defendant with attempting to treat her improperly.

In his sermon in St. Andrew's Church, Ottawa, yesterday, Principal Grant used the following phrase, which is worth remembering : "The curse of Christ's Church is the sectarian ; the curse of the world in general is the partisan."

AT A VANDERBILT BALL.

Where Affluence and Extravagance Met Hand-in-Hand.

A New York despatch, referring to the great ball at the residence of Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt, Fifth avenue, on Monday night, says : As the great oaken doors incessantly swing on their hinges warm draughts of air sweetly perfumed with flowers floated out to revive the waifs and strays assembled to peer from darkness into light. The wild melody of the Hungarian Band and the more measured strains of Lander alternately set the tramps' cold feet in motion. Footmen in livery directed the initiated to the various dressing rooms. The men turned to the left, entered a small room with walls and ceiling of carved ebony, passed down a staircase of the same lustrous wood and entered the big billiard room, with the basement library adjoining, where they stowed away their coats and hats and settled their ties and back hair. The ladies mounted six steps with palms on either side, passed under a portiere that suggested the palace of Alladin and entered the large hall. The caryatides on either side of the carved mantel supported orchids in white tipped with pink, and a row of what seemed to be illuminated roses, but were lily shaped electric globes of pink, each one encased in a bit of pale pink silk. In the great fireplace were masses of brilliant red poinsettia, geranium and African orchids, as though a perfumed fire without heat, with a bank of primroses for a back log. Mrs. Vanderbilt, looking thoroughly radiant and beautiful in a French gown of tulle over satin, received the guests in Lovis XVI. drawing-room, where the flowers were entirely lilies of the valley, in keeping with the white and gold walls and furnishings. In the 3d drawing-room adjoining was a stand of smilax, cedar and ferns, covered with rare cabataya, orchids, and here Lander and fifteen musicians played all evening, and scattered about were great vases filled with rare pink buds, American beauties and magna chartas. Across the hall, in the big picture gallery, the conservatory, music room and Turkish room were set small tables, each lit by crimson shaded candles, and in these apartments at 1 o'clock a delicious supper was served. It was half-past 11 before Johnston had opened a half dozen carriage doors, but at midnight three hundred guests were dancing in the hall and two drawing-rooms. All the women wore new gowns, and diamonds were as plentiful as dewdrops on May grass. The young married women were radiant in Directoire gowns of brocade and fine lace, and the maidens in tulles and gauzes shot with gold or silver tinsel and girdled by silken sashes on many colors.

MADE RICH IN 30 MINUTES.

Two Brothers Strike a $100,000 Mine by Digging Down Two Feet.

S. R. Roger and his brother left their homes near Hastings, Mich., about four years ago and went to Breckinridge, Col., where they worked in a stamp mill. They got possession of two claims, the "Iron Mask" and the "Kewanee," and worked them during spare hours, putting considerable time and money into them. The claims had been worked previously for six years by an old miner, who failed to find paying ore. Roger recently put a man in the lower one and went to work himself. In less than half an hour, after digging about two feet, he struck gold and silver bearing carbonate of silver, said to be the most valuable and easily worked in the State. The vein was followed to the surface, when it was found that all the previous year's work had been within eighteen inches of the vein. The Roger Brothers have been offered $100 000 for two mines, but want $200 000. Within a week after this find 5,000 men were on the spot, establishing claims, but the Rogers have secured many of the most desirable. The mine is on the east side of the mountain, and the snow necessitates keeping it roofed over.—Chicago Tribune.

IRISHMEN IN JAIL.

O'Brien's Rough Treatment by Warders—Other M. P.s Sentenced.

A Dublin cable says : Mr. Wm. O'Brien was yesterday lodged in Clonmel jail, to undergo the sentence of four months' imprisonment imposed on him. When ordered to remove his clothing and don the prison garb he refused, whereupon he was seized by the warders and his clothing was forcibly removed. His beard was then shaved off. He made a desperate resistance, and was exhausted by the struggle. His prostration was so severe that a priest was summoned.

The Nationalists are greatly agitated over the treatment of Mr. William O'Brien. It is stated that he was severely injured in the body during the struggle with the jail warders, and that he is still much prostrated. He wears only a shirt, refusing to put on the prison garb.

Messrs. John O'Connor and Thos. Condon, members of Parliament for Tipperary, were yesterday sentenced to imprisoment for four months without hard labor, for inciting tenants not to pay rent. They appealed.

Domestic Animals in Ireland.

It appears from the official statistics that last year there were 557,405 horses in Ireland, which was an increase of 8,201 as compared with 1886. There were 199,512 asses, being an increase of 3,267, and 29,829 mules, as against 29,195. There was a decrease of 26,520 in the number of cattle, but the increase in pigs and sheep was 145,314 and 11,783 respectively. There were 27,172 goats, being an increase of 5,553, and there was an increase of upward of 550,000 in the number of poultry.—London Truth.

The Princess Louise as a Sculptor.

The statue which the Princess Louise is at work on, and which is to be erected in Kensington Gardens, between the Palace and the Round Pond, as a Jubilee memorial, will represent Her Majesty as she appeared on that morning in June, 1837, when it was announced to her that she was Queen of England. The Princess Victoria on this occasion appeared in her night garment, with a shawl loosely thrown over her shoulders, and in this costume she appears in Sir George Hayter's well-known picture.

The Governor-General and Lady Stanley gave a very brilliant reception in the Senate Chamber on Saturday evening.

THE FASCINATION OF AFRICA.

Explorers Have Been Loth to Leave the Strangely Attractive Country.

Now that Stanley has been heard from, the question that has before been agitated again presents itself. Is there some peculiar fascination about Africa which attracts travellers to remain there ? All data would seem to corroborate the assertion. The Portuguese who settled in Africa nearly all remained. Speke, Grant and other explorers found great attractions in the way of climate and scenery, especially in Equatorial Africa. Stanley has always been ready to make additional explorations and has no fear of the deadly influences of climate, about which so much was written in former times. The more the interior of Africa is made known to the outside world the better it appears. It cannot be an undesirable country as to those parts where white men have spent many years, and to which they are so much attached that they have no desire to leave, even when their friends send costly expeditions to bring them home. Emin Bey never wanted to leave Africa. His province was watered by the White Nile and by the Albert Nyanza Lake, and the territory over which he appears to have undisputed sway is larger than Great Britain. Africa has a fascination to those who are not killed by the climate, and on all the table lands of the equatorial regions the climate is described as favorable to life and health. Livingstone never wanted to leave Africa. He refused to go when Stanley found him, and in fact, never did leave the country until his body was borne out, packed like a bale of merchandise. He contracted the disease that carried him off in the lowland country. In fact, many of his explorations were conducted with little regard to climatic influences. According to Stanley's latest letter he is in good health and these climatic influences seem to have had no deleterious effect upon him and his companions. It may be, after all, that the fascination of Africa has grown upon him.

Renovating Run-Out Orchards.

We often meet with an orchard of apparently healthy trees, which is practically fruitless. The owner may tell us that it formerly bore abundant crops, but of late years the trees have "run out." Why have they "run out ?" They formerly gave good crops of apples. All the other land on the farm was expected to give but one good crop, but this of the orchard was made to give a crop of grain, or a crop of grass or clover, to be taken off as hay. The soil soon became tired of doing this double duty. The trees "gave out" because they were robbed of food ; the first thing they need is feeding. Of course if the soil needs draining, lay the needed tiles at once, or as soon as the soil will allow. Such orchards are usually in grass ; draw on a heavy dressing of manure and spread it, and, as soon as the soil is in proper condition, turn over the sod and the manure with the plough ; with the hot weather the sod will decay rapidly. When this is found to be well rotted, give another ploughing, and a deep one. If ashes can be had, spread a heavy coating and harrow ; in the absence of ashes, harrow in a good dressing of lime. If the trunk and larger branches are covered with loose scales of old bark upon which lichens and mosses have a foot-hold, scrape off the loose bark, using a blunt, short-handled hoe as a scraper. Then in a damp time or thaw wash the trees with soft soap, made thin enough to apply with a brush. Use home-made soft soap, made with lye or potash. That sold at the stores is usually merely hard soap mixed with water and very deficient in strength and quite inferior to home-made. Mix the soap with enough water to work readily, go over the scraped portions with it, and leave the spring rain to finish the work. In due time the bark will be found beautifully smooth and deprived of all foreign growth. The soap that has been washed into the soil will act as a useful fertilizer. Long neglected trees usually require pruning, and this must depend upon the condition of the tree. Never cut out a branch without good reason for it. If the top has become crowded, cut out enough branches to let light and air into the centre ; if grown one side, remove the branches needed to restore the balance. If large wounds are made, smooth the surface and paint them over with some dark-colored paint.—American Agriculturist for January.

Odd Courtship and Marriage.

The Lewiston (N. Y.) Review says that for some time past Miss Minnie Ralston, a pretty little lady living not far from that place, has been corresponding with a Mr. Rupert, of Pompeii, Mich., whom she had never seen. He arrived there one day last week and called on Miss Ralston and introduced himself. Mr. Rupert said : "My clothes look rough, and they are, but I have a big heart and good bank account." He showed his prospective bride his bank book, and said : "Will you marry me?" Miss Ralston replied "I will." Mr. Rupert then reached for his hip pocket and pulled therefrom a large roll of money and counted out five one hundred dollar bills, which he handed to Miss Ralston, saying, "Here's a small wedding present for you." Mr. Patterson, the lady's brother-in-law, who was present, then went for the hoehse and the Rev. Mr. Turner, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, performed the ceremony. The groom is about 45 years old and the bride about 25.

Extra Hazardous.

"What do you mean by canceling my policy ?" angrily cried an excited young man. "We were very sorry to be compelled to pursue such a course," replied the insurance superintendent, "but we have just learned you are going to join a football team."

A Desperate Resolve.

Stern father—"It is useless, sir, to ask me for any more help. I have done all for you I shall ever do. You can go hang yourself if you choose."

Scapegrace son (wildly)—"Never ! I'll marry first."

The warehouse owned by Gunn & Co., of Ailsa Craig, was entered some time during Wednesday night and six of the smallest and finest dressed hogs stored therein were stolen. There is no clue to the thieves, excepting the track of a light waggon, the marks of which can be seen for quite a distance, leading in an easterly direction. This is the second time this firm has had hogs stolen from its warehouse.

PARLIAMENT OPENS.

THE SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

The city is full of visitors. Hundreds of applications for tickets to the galleries of the Senate to witness the opening ceremony had to be refused. All the tickets were given out last evening, and in number they were far beyond the seating capacity of the galleries. Many who had tickets were consequently crowded out. The floor of the Senate Chamber was filled with Senators, their wives, daughters and lady friends in low-necked dress. Around His Excellency, who was seated on the throne, were Ministers of the Crown in their bright Windsor uniforms, Justices of the Supreme Court in their brilliant red robes, and the "aides" of Government House. Though a little blizzard was blowing at the time, it did not deter the people turning out in large numbers to see the procession from Government House to the Parliament Buildings and giving a hearty cheer to Their Excellencies as they passed. An escort was supplied by the Princess Louise Dragoon Guards, and the guard of honor was from the Governor-General's Foot Guards. Everything passed off very successfully. The Speech from the Throne, delivered by His Excellency, was as follows

Hon Gentlemen of the Senate, Gentlemen of the House of Commons

In addressing the Parliament of Canada for the first time, in fulfilment of the important trust which has been committed to me as Her Majesty's representative, I desire to express the satisfaction with which I resort to your advice and assistance. I am conscious of the honor which attends my association with your labors for the welfare of the Dominion, and it will be my earnest endeavor to co operate with you to the utmost of my power in all that may promote the prosperity of the people of this country, the development of her material resources and the maintenance of the constitutional ties which unite her Provinces.

THE FISHERIES TREATY FAILURE.

It is to be regretted that the treaty concluded between Her Majesty and the President of the United States for the adjustment of the questions which have arisen with reference to the fisheries has not been sanctioned by the United States Senate, in whom the power of ratification is vested, and that our legislation of last year on the subject is therefore in a great measure inoperative. It now only remains for Canada to continue to maintain her rights as prescribed by the convention of 1818 until some satisfactory readjustment is arranged by treaty between the two nations.

THE FUNDY BAY LINE LAW.

A measure will again be submitted to you to amend the Acts respecting the electoral franchise, for the purpose of simplifying the law and lessening the cost of its operation.

FINANCIAL LAWS.

It is expedient in the interests of commerce to assimilate and in some particulars to amend the laws which now obtain in the several Provinces of the Dominion relating to bills of exchange, cheques and promissory notes, and a Bill with this object will be laid before you. A Bill will also be provided for making uniform throughout the Dominion the laws relating to bills of lading.

THE OCEAN STEAMSHIPS.

During the recess my Government has carefully considered the subject of ocean steam service, and you will be asked to provide subsidies for the improvement of the Atlantic mail service, and for the establishment in concert with Her Majesty's Government of a line of fast steamers between British Columbia and China and Japan. Your attention will also be invited to the best mode of developing our trade and securing direct communication by steam with Australasia, the West Indies and South America.

MORE LAW DOCTORING.

A Bill will be submitted for your consideration for the prevention of certain offences in connection with municipal councils and to give greater facilities for making inquiries as to such matters. Several measures will also be presented to you for improving the law of procedure in criminal cases. Among those will be a Bill to permit the release on probation of persons convicted of first offences. A Bill authorizing regulation to be made for the practice in cases partaking of the nature of criminal proceedings, and a Bill to make the Speedy Trials Act applicable throughout Canada.

Bills relating to the inspection of timber and lumber, for the improvement of the postal system, and for increasing the efficiency of the Northwest Mounted Police will also be submitted for your consideration.

"THE ROYAL LABORERS."

The Royal Commissioners of Labor having concluded their inquiries, I hope to be able to lay before you at an early day their report, with the important evidence collected by them in various parts of Canada.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The accounts for the past and the estimates for the ensuing year will be laid before you. These estimates have been prepared with a due regard to economy and the efficiency of the public service.

Honorable Gentlemen of the Senate:
Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I now commend these several subjects and the others which may be brought before you to your earnest consideration, and I trust that the result of your deliberations may, under the divine blessing, tend to promote the well-being and prosperity of Canada.

OTTAWA, Feb. —The Speaker took the chair at 3 p. m.

Mr. Denison presented petitions from the Knights of Labor, Toronto, praying for the establishment of a national holiday for wage earners and for legislation to compel vessel owners to carry competent crews, and for the proper inspection of engines and harbors.

Mr. R. S. White, on rising to move the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, was received with cheers. After an allusion to the death of his father, the late Minister of the Interior, and the circumstances under which he came to occupy a seat in the House, he proceeded to discuss the topics of the Speech. Referring at some length to the fishery question, he expressed regret that the work of the joint High Commission had been made abortive by the action of the American Senate in its rejection of the treaty last August. The incident of the retaliatory message was, he said, the only new event of importance in connection with this question during recess. The course of President Cleveland in relation thereto he characterized as most inconsistent and illogical, and manifestly dictated by party expediency. The threatened retaliation was received by the Canadian press with admirable spirit, who, without distinction of party, expressed the universal opinion that Canada must not allow herself to be browbeaten and coerced by her big neighbor. Taking up the reference in the speech to franchise, he said that the Dominion measure had undoubtedly enlarged the electorate by broadening the basis of suffrage, and had secured the advantage of practical uniformity the country over. The subject had been debated more or less in the House, in the press and on the public platform since 1885, and it was a fair interpretation of that discussion to say that the current of opinion favored the principle of the Dominion law. The objections advanced to the measure had relation wholly to the expense of revision and preparation of the lists, and to the somewhat complex character of the law, and he was sure the House had learned with pleasure of the intention of the Government to introduce a measure for the purpose of simplifying the law and lessening the cost of its operation—a law whose character is already so liberal as virtually to confer the suffrage upon every citizen of the country who is not a confirmed pauper, and who, in a word, is interested in its progress and prosperity, and in the maintenance of law and order. He referred to the financial condition of Canada as evidence of her ability to undertake subsidies to the Atlantic and Pacific steam services, and showed that while in the first twelve years of Confederation only six million dollars of the increase in public debt had been contributed from within the country, during the last nine years no less than forty-three millions of the increase had been contributed by the Canadian people. These figures, he held, should sustain the view that the wealth and prosperity of the people had enormously increased of late years and that we are from day to day becoming better able from within ourselves to contribute the necessary means for expenditures for the provision of works of general public utility. The large outlay upon the C P R. when first proposed had excited a good deal of alarm in many quarters, and doleful predictions of the evils that were to befall the country therefrom were freely indulged in, yet the completion of that work had immensely increased the reputation of Canada abroad, and had so enhanced her credit in the great money market of the world that during the past summer we were able to place a 3 per cent. loan at 95, and to-day her credit stood on a par with that of India and not very far behind that of the Mother Country herself.

Mr. Lepine, in French, seconded the address. He intimated that, as he had been elected as a representative of the workingmen, he would be bound primarily to protect the interests of the class he represented irrespective of party, but he believed the Conservative party had always been friendly to the workingman, and he was disposed to give the Government a fair trial on its general policy. He would, however resist to the utmost every attempt to encroach upon the autonomy of the Provincial Legislatures, and he believed the Government had been prevented to a great extent from legislating for the working classes by the fact that under the constitution the Provinces claimed to have control of this question.

Mr. Laurier, after complimenting the mover and seconder of the address on the manner in which they had acquitted themselves, concurred in the complimentary references to Lord Stanley, and congratulated the country on the uniform good fortune which had attended the selection of the Governor-General. The Speech was more meagre than usual. A number of needed reforms were omitted mention of, none of which was more urgent than the question of securing better trade with the United States. Though the Government had not seen fit to mention this subject in the Speech, he believed it would not be long before they would be forced by public feeling to take up the question, and to adopt the views which he and his friends had been advocating in regard to it. He expected also that the long promised legislation in regard to the workingman would have been foreshadowed in the Speech. It was to be regretted also that no amendment to the Customs Act was promised. Many of the provisions of this Act were repugnant to the commercial community. During the past year the sum of $98,000 had been levied upon the commerce of the country in the way of fines and seizures, nearly all of which had been disbursed to officers of the Customs Department. Many of these men were in this way receiving princely incomes at the expense of the mercantile community. The Franchise Act, however, was more privileged in having been mentioned in the Speech. The career of this Act had not been a glorious one. It would seem as if the Administration were ashamed of their progeny. Year after year the Act had been altered and amended, and still the Government clung to the measure, notwithstanding the repeated calls of the Conservative press for manhood suffrage. The reason for refusing to go the length of manhood suffrage was plain. In regard to the promised measure to encourage trade with Australasia, he said the policy of the Opposition was to favor the extension of trade with all parts of the world. He was, however, sorry that the party opposite, instead of looking to the Antipodes for an extended market, did not seek for it in the great republic to the south of us. The Speech differed from all former ones delivered in recent years in that it contained not the slightest congratulation on the prosperous condition of the country, owing primarily to the operation of the National Policy and secondly to Providence. (Laughter.) He believed that every act friendly to the United States was to the advantage of England and Canada—(hear, hear)—and that anything which would increase the friendship of all the members of the great Anglo-Saxon family, scattered over the world, was a step forward in the civilization of the world. The Opposition would exercise their right to criticize the measures of the Government, but they were desirous of entering at once into the business of the session, and would do everything to hasten its progress.

Sir John Macdonald congratulated the leader of the Opposition on the kindly manner in which he had addressed the House. That, however, was his usual manner. If the bill of fare was a meagre one, it was calculated to suit the weak digestion of hon. gentlemen opposite. Milk for babes and strong meat for men—(cheers)—and his hon. friends opposite were still in the weakness of political juvenility. The hon. gentleman had asked why we did not extend our trade to the South? The reason was that the South would not allow us. We had been desirous and ready from 1854 to the present moment and had shown our readiness to enter into the most friendly commercial and social relations with the United States, but we could not secure the desired end unless perhaps at a price that we did not choose to give. The hon. gentleman would not, he thought, give that price himself. It had been announced by the leading men of the United States, by the men who, in the near future, would direct the political course of that country, that there was to be no extension of trade with that country unless it would be by selling our heritage for a mess of pottage, by giving up our allegiance to our sovereign and becoming a subservient outskirt of the neighboring republic. Unless we were willing to pay that price all hopes of an extension of our trade with the South could not be realized, and the project of Commercial Union would have to be abandoned. Referring to the complaint that no alteration was announced in the Customs Act, and that the mercantile community would suffer thereby he believed the mercantile community could take care of themselves. If the law relating to the Customs or to the administration of the Customs Act pressed unduly on the commercial body, they would let the House and the country know it. Where were the petitions from the commercial community complaining of the working of the Customs law? That law was necessarily stringent. It would have no value if it were not so. The ways and wiles of the smuggler and trader were dark and needed to be closely watched, or the operations of the Act would be nugatory. In conclusion, he expressed the hope and belief that due progress would be made in the business of the session with the assistance and candid criticism of hon. gentlemen opposite, and that a number of useful measures would be passed which would tend to develop the country.

The address was then carried and ordered to be presented to His Excellency by such members of the House as are of Her Majesty's Privy Council.

The House adjourned at 7:30.

Facts About Famous Poems.

Gray's "Elegy" occupied him for seven years.

Bryant wrote "Thanatopsis" in the shade of a grand old forest—a fitting spot for such a theme.

Cowper wrote one of the drollest and quaintest English ballads, "John Gilpin's Ride," when he was under those fits of depression so common to him.

General Lyle wrote his beautiful composition, "Antony and Cleopatra," which begins, "I am dying, Egypt, dying," on the night before his death. He had a premonition that he was going to die the next day.

The noted poem, "The Falls of Niagara," was written by its author, J. G. C. Brainard, the editor of a small paper in Connecticut, in fifteen minutes. He wrote it under pressure in response to a call for "more copy."

"After the Ball," the little poem which has made the name of Nora Perry known in the world of letters, was jotted down on the back of an old letter, with no idea of the popularity it was to achieve in the pages of a noted magazine.

Poe first thought of "The Bells" when walking the streets of Baltimore on a winter night. He rang the bell of a lawyer's house—a stranger to him—walked into the gentleman's library, shut himself up, and the next morning presented the lawyer with a copy of his celebrated poem.

Thomas Moore, while writing "Lalla Rookh," spent so many months in reading up Greek and Persian works that he became an accomplished Oriental scholar, and people found it difficult to believe that its scenes were not penned on the spot instead of in a retired dwelling in Devonshire.

The "Old Oaken Bucket" was first suggested to the author, Samuel Woodworth, in a bar-room. A friend with whom he was drinking said that when they were boys the old oaken bucket that hung in his father's well was good enough for them to drink from. Woodworth immediately went home and wrote the famous poem.

Queer Methods of Real Estate Agents.

A novel method of making a house appear to be valuable, and thus securing a sale at a good price, was exposed by Architect Renwick the other day in his testimony before the Elevated Railway Damage Commission. He proposed to buy two tenement houses in Third avenue. He was assured that the property was paying a handsome interest; that it was full of tenants, and he could go and see for himself. He sent an agent, who reported that the buildings were full of tenants. So he bought the buildings on the calculation that the rentals were 10 per cent. of the value of the property. As soon as he got possession he found that the tenants began to move out. Then he learned that they had occupied the place rent free. The building had been salted with tenants in much the same way that naughty men have been known to salt mining property with rich specimens.

SLEEP, AND HOW TO GET IT.

Billy O'Day Gives the Readers of this Paper Some Practical Hints.

It is my honest belief that we should have evangelists going up and down the land teaching people the art of sleep. Few, yes, comparatively few, are the number in this present age who retire and wake up finding they have slept right through to their destination, the rising hour. No, most people must, if not awake already, wake up and find out where they are. Then again there are others who, like the man on the train fast asleep and without a ticket, can't be awakened. To such a class an alarm clock is a useless article, possibly they may just hear it the first time they use it, but they will never hear it the second time. Unless they do, as our Irish friend did, sit up all night and set it off. I have a friend whose employment requires him to spin at night instead of day; I might term him one of the seven sleepers, as he is ever ready for sleep. I have known him to sleep standing up, and upon one occasion, when asleep in bed in the day time, a colored artist frescoed the room he was sleeping in without his knowledge. Such cases are rare, yes, very rare, as ninety-nine out of every one hundred persons are not sound sleepers. The chief cause is physical, mental and social dissipation. In the first place, some overwork the body, which is injurious, and causes restlessness. Then there are those who have much mental work, perhaps sitting in an office all day, then riding home at night and strangely possessing an appetite that cuts clear through and the way from oysters to almond nuts. Then they sit around all evening and before retiring partake of what they term a light lunch, consisting of lobster salad, cheese pickles, mince pie, and go to bed wondering why they can't sleep. They are giving the machine more than it can grind. Then there are men who put five dollars into a three-card trick and lose and lie awake all night wondering whether they will lose five dollars or make five hundred. Then there are men who worry. These don't get any sleep and don't need any, if they take these bitter pills let them chew them. Now, we have the social dissipation. There are hundreds of young men and women in this city who never see their beds are the morning hours. It's germans, levees, kirmesse, receptions, balls or banquets. These folks are on the lightning [illegible] and unless they are wise, and jump off in time can stop them save the marble headstones in the cemetery. Many a young wife has called trouble of this kind [illegible] a gentleman not long since wrote the following letter to his partner retired.

What shall I do. We have many friends and are invited out perpetually. I am on a salary in a large New York business establishment. To meet my engagements I am obliged to rise in the morning at [illegible] but I cannot get home from these parties until 1 in the morning. Then the excitements of the evening keep me awake for an hour or two after I retire, and then late taking of food disturbs my sleep all night long. I must give up either social life or my business, which is my livelihood. My wife is not willing I should give up social life, for she is very popular and I have not health to stand it and attend to my business. What shall I do?" Dr. Talmage said, if he had answered this letter, he would have begun by saying: "Dear Sir—If what you say is true, your wife is a fool. If she is willing to sacrifice your health, and with it the support of the family, for the greeting and applause of the midnight saturnalia, I pity you. Use your own judgment, my self-elected correspondent. Once lose your health, and then your business position, and then your income, and see how many levees you will be invited to. All the diamond backed terrapins at $50 a dozen which you are invited to partake of after your money is gone will not do you any damage. Society will let you drop so suddenly it will knock the breath out of you. Yours truly, signed) Pastor of Brooklyn Tabernacle. This is sound advice, and I hope it was followed out. Then, there are a class of people who won't allow themselves, or any one else in the house, to sleep. Soon as they touch the pillow they sink into dreamland. But, lo, they snore. If you have not already, just listen once to a man that snores. See how beautifully he works up a grand crescendo. By the time he gets as loud as the tuba on a $1,000 organ he wakes himself up, and he wonders why he can't sleep. Still another kind of sleeper—not the railroad sleeper, but the sleeper who sleeps with his mouth open. It's bad enough to have one's mouth open in the day-time. It's worse at night. Silence is golden. The mouth is not to be used for breathing. Breathe through your nose. If you awake and find your mouth open get up and shut it, instead of breathing through your teeth, thereby emitting a shrill whistle, as if calling a dog. I don't wonder so many dogs bark at nights, when there are so many people calling them. Last of all, we have the man who sleeps so soundly that he rises without even awakening—not even waiting to attire himself with a paper collar or a straw hat. These people have taken long constitutionals and have returned greatly refreshed thereby. These folks don't need any advice and won't get any. —Yours forever. BILLY O'DAY.

Curiosities of Suicide.

A Roman lady swallowed red-hot coals.

A Frenchman built a small guillotine and beheaded himself.

An English iron-worker literally jumped into a fiery furnace.

Domestic trouble is the principal cause of suicide; alcoholism comes next.

In America June is the favorite month for committing suicide; in France August.

At Plymouth, England, a man tied his hands and feet together (?) and then jumped into the water.

France is the banner suicide country. In that country 216 persons in 1,000,000 take their own lives; in England 74.

Jance Meryessi, an Austrian 84 years old, killed himself because he could no longer support his parents, aged 115 and 110 respectively.

A Campaign Echo.

"Ah, my darling," murmured J. Court Plasser, as they sat on a sofa in the softly lighted parlor, "you must forgive your ducky for what he said to little brother at the supper table, but little brother was naughty, you know. What's the matter with Johnny lately, birdie, anyway?" Johnny (from behind the sofa)—"He's all right!"

What Ails You?

Do you have dull, heavy, headache, obstruction of the nasal passages, discharges falling from the head into the throat, sometimes profuse, watery and acrid, at others thick, tenacious, mucous, purulent, bloody and putrid; eyes weak, watery and inflamed; ringing in the ears, deafness, hacking or coughing to clear the throat, expectoration of offensive matter, together with scabs from ulcers, voice changed and nasal twang; breath offensive; smell and taste impaired; is there a sensation of dizziness, with mental depression, a hacking cough and general debility? If you have all, or any considerable number of these symptoms, you are suffering from Nasal Catarrh. The more complicated your disease has become, the greater the number and diversity of symptoms. Thousands of cases annually, without manifesting half of the above symptoms, result in consumption, and end in the grave. No disease is so common, more deceptive and dangerous, less understood, or more unsuccessfully treated by physicians. The manufacturers of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy offer, in good faith, a reward of $500 for a case of this disease which they cannot cure. The Remedy is sold by druggists, at only 50 cents.

HOME KNOWLEDGE ASSOCIATION.

Early last fall a gentleman representing the "Home Knowledge Association" of Toronto canvassed this town for subscribers. He carried with him a magnificent atlas which was to be furnished to each subscriber. The subscription fee was ten dollars and the object was to furnish cheap books on the wholesale plan. The atlas itself was valued at from five to seven dollars. The agent said that these atlases would be delivered in about five weeks. This was nearly five months ago and no delivery has been made. We notice by our exchanges that agents are still canvassing the country upon the same representations. No doubt the firm has sold a very large number of books through this agency, and no doubt, too, they have made considerable money out of these sales. If they do not deliver the promised atlases their profit will be still larger, even if they do not claim the ten dollars, inasmuchas the moment you become a subscriber you are "entitled to buy books at the reduced rate." It may be all right, but our suspicions have been aroused and we want our atlas right away, otherwise we claim the prerogative of believing this "Home Knowledge" scheme a sell.

A French gardener has discovered that by heating his earth with steam pipes he can increase its productiveness one hundred fold. The world is progressing. We now hatch chickens with coal oil, grow vegetables with steam, keep books with machinery, and do many other curious things which prove that humanity is still improving his surroundings as fast as circumstances will permit.

Dr. Landerkin is in favor of "granting to farmers and dealers in live stock a refund of the duty paid upon corn imported and fed to cattle and hogs for export," his argument being that a refund is allowed upon whiskey manufactured from imported corn. We do not imagine that this question will be considered as vitally important by farmers in general. The yeomanry of his constituency do not fatten their cattle and pigs upon imported corn or corn of any kind. It might be a small advantage to stock raisers along the border, but we do not imagine that the Dr's. suggestion will be of sufficent importance to make his constituents raise and thank him en masse.

Chesley Heal, a native of Maine, died not long ago at the age of 110. He was an interesting old character, weighed 175 pounds, was a farmer, a great talker, and was only once visited by a physician previous to his last illness. His faculties continued unimpaired until the end, and this notwithstanding the deplorable fact that he was a heavy tobacco user all his life. His is another evidence of the deleterious effects of the noxious weed! Smokers and chewers will no doubt take warning by this terrible case of longevity and discard the poisonous thing.

The new law regulating the width of sleighs, passed at the late County Council in Owen Sound, will eventually be a boon to all teamsters. The tendency has been heretofore to gradually decrease the width of sleighs until, in some parts of this county, horses are obliged to "crowd" in order to keep the road, and sleighs of fair width "cut down" at the side, thereby seriously retarding travel where snow is very deep. With the new order of things this will all be obviated, and we think our representatives at the county town did a wise act in making it compulsory to run sleighs of a uniformly good width.

Two interesting matters were brought up during Monday's session of Parliament at Ottawa. Hon. Mr. Haggart gave the information that it was not the Government's intention to institute a two cent postal rate for the Dominion. The other matter of interest was a discussion introduced by Mr. Mulock with the object of securing free entery to Canada of fertilizers. Several members took part in the discussion. Dr. Sproule pointed out that if the duty was removed American fertilizers would be brought in of little or no value, whereas with the present system in force the Government provides for an analysis fixing their true worth. In Canada we had all the raw material necessary to produce first-class fertilizers, and in maintaining the duty an important industry would be protected.

Mr. Thomas Dynes of this place has sold off all his farm stock and implements and is preparing to move to the North-west. His departure will be regretted by his many warm friends, and our worst wishes are that he may be successful on his new farm.

Mr. Robert Graham and his company of men have been making square timber here for the past week. The timber supply is becoming smaller in this locality as each winter passes.

Mr. G. I. Graham is rushing a big business in the saw log line.

From our own Correspondent.

A number of our young men took in Feversham Orange soiree, but no person need ask them where they stayed or what happened by the way.

Mr. Purdy, our general postmaster, has been on the sick list for the past few days, but we are glad to see that he is able to be around and attend to his duties again.

Mr. James Meldrum, of Colorado, U. S., has been visiting his parents and friends in and around Eugenia. Many years have passed away since Mr. Meldrum was in this part of the country and during that time he has been engaged in various pursuits, but his present occupation is in the mining industry. Mr. Meldrum can tell many stories of the far off lands, and is vivid in his descriptions of the mountains and romantic scenery of his adopted state

There is considerable talk, and no little trouble over the timber business in the surrounding country. The men in the employ of the company represented by Mr. Holmes have been working all winter to within a week or so, and the money is not forth coming either for them or for the timber owners. It is reported that the bailiff was to seize the timber last Friday and hold it until the men had received their pay and other exponses defrayed, but I have not been able to ascertain whether it was seized or not. Another report says that it is about to be turned over to a second company. However the men refuse to work until their wages are paid up.

During Mr. J. R. Hogg's absence to Toronto, he left Mr H. Cairns in charge of his business here. Henry makes quite an accommodating clerk, and a great many of the young ladies suddenly find out they want some thing from the store, for the clerk is single and needs a w—.

A Gossipy Budget From Eugenia.

From an Occasional Correspondent.

The winter is fast speeding away. The snow is deepening; the cold intensifying; the sleighing improving; the teaming briskening as indicated by the busy rushing in of timber to the railway line, also the wood business, which is looking up. Feed is scarce, yet the farmers in general say they will pull through all right, presuming that the warm weather, the spring and the grass pass around at about the usual time. The merchants are doing about a usual business, and looking forward with hope. The postoffice, under the management of the ever-past, the very present, and for a time future postmaster, does an ever increasing business, as "factified" by the huge piles of correspondence—mercantile, political, religious, social, loveable-etc.—arriving and departing at the appointed times. This goes to prove that the masses are increasing, the population multiplying rapidly, the families compounding incessantly, till we are led to ask in serious alarm, What shall be done with the pouring in overplus—although this is the great, long, wide, high, deep Canada it is. Hurrah! Yah, yah, do you know it Bro Jonathan? The preacher calls upon his appointed rounds methodically; the Gospel trumpet sounds powerfully; the fruit, material, spiritual, has been, is now and shall be seen after many days. The doctor scurries hither and thither betimes. No seriously alarming cases that we know of. This, our town, Eugenia, is acceded to be a healthy spot generally. The boys and girls—aye, and the old folks too—have had a gay time at the several tea meeting institutions of the past few weeks, and are anticipating stirring seasons in the future. The public school is improving under the jurisdiction of Mr. S. Clegues—the scholarly gentleman he is. No boisterous bombast, but a very decided educational enthusiast. The ranks of bumpkins are constantly extending, seats filling, vacancies getting scarce. Oh dear, what will become of us—add to our accommodation or build greater? The excellence of the individual scholarships are advancing rapidly. The darkness is past. The fire fiend, with breath of smoke and tongue of flame, greedily licked up the house of Thos. Crowe. A good part of the most valuable household goods were saved by the prompt, vigorous efforts of those who were on the scene to render help. After the smoke was noticed by Mr. F. Carr, and the alarm spread, but a very few minutes were all that the neighbors had to save anything, so rapid was the destruction. No insurance—the loss heavy in the circumstances. The quarterly council of the Methodist Church of the mission held its regular session on Monday, and the quarterly religious services were held Sunday, Feb. 10, with a goodly number absent who surely ought to have been there. A good stiff breeze is blowing now, with drifting, blinding snow, but this isn't a blizzard; pshaw no; that's foreign manufacture. Mr. Dinwoodie occupied the pulpit of Eugenia church Sunday night, acceptably. He is an earnest, rising star, surely. Will tell you some more next time. F. T. C.

Flesherton Station.

Gleaned by our own Reporter.

The past week the weather has been somewhat stormy and unsettled, and many of the roads have been anything but good, and business at present seems to be at a standstill in some respects, but yet a fair trade is done considering the size of our town.

Mr. McGinnis, our genial landlord of the beehive, is still to the front in this line as the street at times is strewn with sleighs and cutters so that it is almost impossible for teams to pass each other or get ingress into his shed. It would be well for some one to request of him to try and make better accomodations in that respect for the travelling public.

Mr. A McLeod, our enterprising framer and house carpenter, has a large amount of work on hand for the coming season, and will be able to give employment to six or seven men. Try The Advance again, Angus.

In the shipment of last week Mr. Cook states that he did fairly well with his hogs, as they came out in good condition, considering the inclemency of the weather, but fell somewhat short in the cattle, as they were bought rather close.

We had a pleasant visit from our late teacher, Miss Bull, one day last week. No doubt she was in quest of some one. She looks well and is doing well.

Miss Laura Whitaker, of Toronto, is visiting her many friends here, and is accompanied by Miss Kennedy, of Toronto, who says she is highly delighted with her rural visit.

Mr. Thomas Edwards and John T. Mahany, of the firm of J. Barstall & Co., of Quebec, are staying at McGinnis hotel in connection with the timber trade.

Mr. A. Hannah has purchased an organ for the sum of four hundred dollars. For finish and tone it is all that one could desire. Friend Hannah is bound to enjoy himself in his declining years, to the sweet strains of music. Give me your paw old man.

You had better send your fighting editor out for a few days, as I am about to take a few holidays.

Lines of condolence to Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Stuart on the death of their beloved mother, who died Dec. 20th 1888.

Dear mourning ones! your mother has gone
From all her cares set free;
She has gone to that bright celestial shore,
Where oft she wished to be.

The life is gone, the breath has fled
And what has been no more shall be,
The well loved form, the welcome tread,
O where are they? and where is she?

The cemetery bears an added grave,
The hearth shows a vacant chair,
Here sadness dwells and weeps alone,
And death displays his banner there.

The weary clay may ever rest
Where grass and flowers are spread,
But her sweet spirit warm and true
Lies numbered with the dead.

And when your pilgrimage on earth is o'er,
And you are called above,
May you meet again on that blest shore
Where all is peace and love

ESTELLE'S INFATUATION:

A NOVEL.

Never had Mrs. Clanricarde "voiced aloud" "with shriller throat" her views on the unimportance of the man and the all-importance of the purse in marriage. Never had her scorn for personal love and physical beauty been hotter, more pungent, more severe. To hear her one would have thought love before marriage the doom of happiness after, and a man's beauty not only a snare but a sin. She dwelt on the superiority of moral graces and intellectual soundness to all else that man could possess, till Estelle's fair face grew wan and white with secret loathing, and Caleb's flamed with thoughts to which he dared give neither form nor voice. He was modest to self-abasement, but even he could not fail to see that Mrs. Clanricarde substantially offered him her daughter, and told him that the way was clear and the running already made for him. But Estelle herself? The verdict in her averted eyes was differently framed and spelt from that in Mrs. Clanricarde's; and Caleb was too sensitive to confound compassion with affection. He knew that he was but the Beast to her—no more desirable than Caliban—as little lovely as the hunchback, within whose hump, however, are folded the wings which will one day carry him to heaven. And as something under the ban of love, he bore himself with the patience, the very dignity, indeed, of self-effacement, and the quiet hopelessness which accept the doom of fate and yields to the pressure of the inevitable.

Near to Les Saules ran the prettiest lane in the district. It led to the Close, a wood made by man and nature for love. Love unspoken, estranged, content—for all its phases this wood had special shrines and green-arched temples where to rest and be refreshed. It was the favorite place of meeting for Estelle and Charlie Osborne, and to both every fern and tree and flower was sanctified, and carried its own secret message and reminder. It had also become a favorite hunting-ground with Caleb Stagg, being full of precious creatures not to be found elsewhere."

It was on one of those rare days in England when the house must empty itself and the world must be abroad. No one, not an invalid consents to remain within those stifling four walls of home, and the Clanricardes had been touched by the all pervading enthusiasm with the rest.

"Come for a little walk, Estelle," said Mrs. Clanricarde to her daughter.

And Estelle, who really loved her mother, though she feared her—and at this moment hated her for the activity—was glad to go. But she knew by that secret "telepathy" which "refers hearing as a sixth sense, to one of those messengers which love sends to and fro," and of which the earth is full, that Charlie was waiting for her in the wood there behind the old beech-tree to the right, which was their place of meeting. "Where shall we go, mother?" she asked, kissing her mother as in the days now grown unhappily a little old.

"Oh, anywhere," answered Mrs. Clanricarde.

"To Grantown?" proposed Estelle.

Grantown was a picturesque little hamlet, about a mile from Les Saules, across the fields, and by the river. It was a charming walk, and one of the points of the place.

"No," answered Mrs. Clanricarde.

"Toward the Dower House?" another pretty lady way.

"No," she replied again.

"Where, then, mother?" was Estelle's perplexed demand.

"To the Close," said Mrs. Clanricarde.

"Will it not be very stifling there to day?" asked Estelle, with as much indifference as she could command.

"No; it will be cool," said her mother.

And Estelle had nothing to object. The two went by the little sidewalk into the leafy lane which led to the deep-bosomed wood. But all Estelle's joy had gone, and the cloud between her and her mother lowered more dense than before.

They sauntered down the lane—Estelle, bitten with an insane desire for wild flowers, lingering greatly as she went—till they came to the gate which opened into the paradise of her heart. A hundred yards farther on, round the projection made by an overhanging rock, and they would come in sight of the beech-tree under which she knew that Charlie Osborne was sitting.

The girl's uneasiness was too great to be concealed. Her very efforts to appear indifferent betrayed her anxiety. The way in which she talked—so volubly, so unlike herself and the sharper ring of her voice, more highly pitched than usual, and thrown out as if for other ears than her mother's, all were eloquent enough for Mrs. Clanricarde, who had missed her vocation and her epoch. She should have been one of Fouché's "souricieres." Had she been one she would have made her fortune, dug out of the graves of those she had overshadowed.

Suspecting, watching, she said never a word—only paid out the rope, which Estelle twisted yet tighter round her slender throat. Then they rounded the rock, and with one rapid look—caught by Mrs. Clanricarde as a sportsman shoots flying—the girl's heart gave one full bound of relief. Charlie Osborne was not there. But in his stead, peering on all sides, now his nose flattened against the bark of a tree, now down on the ground turning over last year's dead leaves and dry twigs, a butterfly net in hand, some creatures in his hat, a green tin case strapped round him, in full pursuit of his fancy, riding his hobby, knees and chin together, they came upon Caleb Stagg searching for creatures in Estelle's sacred grove where her god was hidden. Then Mrs. Clanricarde blessed herself for her insistence, and looked on her decision as providential and inspired.

To Estelle it was the other way; and what to her mother was the benevolent work of the good angels was to her the undoubted mischief-making of the bad.

Caleb blushed when he met them, as of course he would; but the mother caught on the wing a look in his eyes as she had caught that in her daughter's. And it was a look that satisfied her. She had made up her mind. Estelle should marry the omad'haun, failing a better provision. If any one more eligible should come along—then the poor omad'haun would be thrown over, with no more remorse than we have when we drop one peach in favor of another, better flavored to the eyes and softer to the touch.

"A lucky chance!" she said, in her kindest way, as she put out her hand for Caleb's, dust and dirt begrimed as it was.

Instinctively he wiped his hand on his coat before he gave it.

"I'm not fit," he said, bashfully.

"The hand of an honest man is alway fit—fit for a queen," said Mrs. Clanricarde, with royal condescension of air and manner.

Her compliment was really regal. Her appreciation of essential qualities was grandly philosophic—nobly heroic.

Caleb blushed again, as painfully as before; and Estelle lifted her pretty chin and curled her lips with the daintiest little line of disdain—which he saw and writhed under, as if it had been a barbed arrow in his breast.

"Let us go and sit there," said Mrs. Clanricarde, pointing to the seat beneath the beech-tree on the right.

"Oh, mother!" exclaimed Estelle, hurriedly. "We shall be eaten up by midgets!" she added, after a second's pause, to explain and conceal the very pronounced opposition—the opposition that was a prayer and cry—in her voice.

"No more there than elsewhere," returned Mrs. Clanricarde, smoothly, as she turned up the trodden path to the tree. "Come, Mr. Stagg; come with us, and show us your interesting collection," she added, sweetly, to Caleb. "I know that Estelle will be glad to see it."

"Do you care for creatures, Miss Clanricarde?" asked Caleb, awkwardly.

"She is devoted to them," put in Mrs. Clanricarde, before Estelle could answer.

"I did not know that I was, mother," said Estelle, her face white, as it was wont to grow when her mother flung her too openly at the omad'haun's head. Besides, she knew that Charlie Osborne was within ear-shot somewhere, spying at them through the smoke-colored glasses of jealousy.

"Indeed I should be glad if you would give her some instruction, Mr. Stagg," said Mrs. Clanricarde, ignoring Estelle's disclaimer. "It is so much better to work under the guidance of a master—and such a good master as you would be."

She smiled benignly. The present need at home was great. She saw ruin on every side, and nothing but a rich marriage, with a margin for herself and that fatal husband of hers, would save them. It was a pity—surely a pity—that she had no better salvation in view than Caleb Stagg; but in the storm who cares for the name, the look the beauty of the port?

"I should be sorry to take up Mr Stagg's time," said Estelle, in a clear renunciatory voice.

"It would be a pleasure, Miss Clanricarde," said Caleb in a low voice.

"I should like it," said Mrs. Clanricarde, a little shrilly. "We will begin our first lesson now, if you please, Mr. Stagg," she added, with a laugh yet more shrill than her spoken words had been.

And Caleb, opening his case, began his roll call of names and characteristics, of which to their mother nor daughter understood one word, nor from which they gained one rational idea. Mrs. Clanricarde thanked him with the most enthusiastic and becoming effusiveness. But Estelle said little that was pleasant, nothing that was encouraging.

"It is far too difficult for me, and I hate those long learned names," she said, coldly.

Charlie hated all science too, and looked on scientific nomenclature as a kind of spiritual deformity—next thing to a crime. She knew that her confession of faith, which she felt sure was heard somehow by him, would please him.

"We must have them, you see, Miss Clanricarde," said Caleb, humbly apologizing for the necessities of science. "They make a kind of general language for all nations. A Russian"—he pronounced it "Rooshian"—"or a Frenchman, or an Englishman, they all know what Papilio cavessa means out the peacock 'butterfly' would not carry far."

"Still, science is horrid. Art and poetry are the only things worth living for," said Estelle, in the same rather unnaturally high-pitched voice she had had throughout.

"I know nothing of either," said Caleb, sadly.

"You are none the worse for that, Mr. Stagg," said Mrs. Clanricarde, with her ambiguous smile. "Poets and artists generally are wretchedly poor creatures, not worth their salt. I so much prefer honest merit and more solid acquirements."

"Mother! as if the greatest gifts God has to give should be spoken of so slightingly!" cried Estelle, in hot haste and hotter anger. "Why, what should we be without poetry and art? Mere earth-worms, knowing nothing of the diviner things of life, seeing nothing but ourselves, and shut out from heaven!" This was Charlie's latest phrase, and Mrs Clanricarde knew it. "Science is soul-destroying," continued Estelle still hot and eager. "Scientific people are atheists."

"Not necessarily, my dear child," said Mrs. Clanricarde, blandly.

"I think not all, Miss Clanricarde," said Caleb, humbly.

"I hate science and all that is scientific," said Estelle, almost in tears; "and nothing should ever make me learn it."

"Come to dinner to-morrow, Mr. Stagg," said Mrs. Clanricarde. "I give you this foolish child of mine to convert from her dreams to your better and sounder ways."

"Mother, this is too bad!" flamed out Estelle. "I will not take lessons from Mr. Stagg."

"Come to dinner, Mr. Stagg," repeated Mrs. Clanricarde; and the unhappy pendulum, swung thus between mother and daughter, had no excuse ready. Yet he would have liked to refuse, only he could not see where the loophole was.

"She will have none of me," he said to himself as he trudged through the wood, no longer a place of enchantment for him. "Her mother will, for they are in but a poor way, and father's means would set them bravely up; but that dainty blossom is not for the like of me, and she will not were it ever so. I feel her tremble with disgust and shame when I touch her hand. God help me! but the smart is sore."

All this time Charlie had been lying hidden within the bracken which grew in a miniature forest among the underwood. He had heard every word, and through the crossing stems, which gave one clear passage not larger than his eye, he had seen every gesture, every look. He understood the whole play. She was to be sacrificed to that cad, that ruffian, that low-lived beast, sitting in his own especial place beneath their holy trysting-tree. There was no term of obloquy, however unfitting, that Charlie did not shower on Caleb Stagg—he whose own humility rated him low enough as things were; he would willingly give his life for Estelle's good, and whose sacrifice would be as his crowning if it insured her gain. But it was only after the rule and line of men's judgments on each other. The glass through which we read hearts and motives is indeed dark, and few of us have love or unselfishness enough to clear it.

CHAPTER VIII.

LOVERS' VOWS.

A change had come into Estelle's sweet face. It had lost its normal shyness for what was a look of fear; and something of that watching, suspicious, hunted sharpness which belongs to those who have a dangerous secret to hide had taken the former clearness out of her candid eyes. Between her lover and her mother she had come to moral grief. Devoted to each, but adding to her love for Charlie fear to hurt him and determination to be faithful; to her love for her mother that piety of obedience natural to a gently nurtured girl, she had fallen into deceit and intrigue. Of course the knowledge that it was "for Charlie" justified a great deal, as it always does in love: but the fact remained the same—she was deceiving her mother, and thereby committing a sin which covered her soul with spiritual shame.

For herself she could have been strong enough to give up this sweet secret fault, but when she spoke of it to Charlie her tears of self-accusation, her gentle prayers to be rendered back to the ways of truth and uprightness, failed against the overmastering need of his egotism—the passionate demands of his love. He softened her moral fibre by the softness of his own, and his tears of supplication dried hers of remonstrance. Then things would go on as before. The meetings, which played with Estelle's very life, were planned and executed with almost double zest for the break which had seemed too likely to come. As yet no harm had come to them. But Mrs. Clanricarde's suspicions were aroused. She was not a nature-born "souriciere" for nothing; and by the very fact that she suspected some kind of underhand association between Estelle and that fascinating detrimental, Charlie Osborne, she determined to push on this matter with Caleb Stagg, and to force her daughter into the lifelong misery and financial redemption of a marriage which would be eminently a gilded horror and legalized slavery to a name and a myth.

She would get over it, the mother argued. Other women have had to suppress their own feelings in favor of their family need, and marry where they did not love, leaving behind them the dearest and adored. So must she. No one is absolutely sui generis in this life, and the rod with which souls are ruled by society is heavy and impartial. We have all to submit to it, so must Estelle. With such a father her fate was predicted. If any one was to blame it was George—that luckless pilot of the financial ship.

So she glozed over her countenance, and added to her reasoning a thick layer of whitewash for poor Caleb, whereby she got rid of a great many of his defects, and made him out at last to be really quite personal and presentable. His "good heart" stood for so much! Shakespeare and Burns were both quoted in his behalf, and the skimmings of his science and his classics stood for thick, rich, soul sustaining cream.

When she let fly these arrows Estelle generally put up the buckler of silence, and always edged away from the subject. She knew that her mother wanted to be more explicit, and to "have it out" with her, and she dreaded only one thing more—the discovery of her secret trysts with Charlie.

Of late, since that encounter with Caleb Stagg in the wood, those trysts had been considerably fewer. In some subtle way she never could quite define how, nor yet could she deny nor circumvent, Mrs. Clanricarde kept Estelle closer than ever by her side. Poor Estelle's heart was torn into still more painful bits, and she scarce knew where to turn or what to do. Charlie eating out his heart in the wood, she feeling hers lacerated in the house, the lover's yearning and the mother's pleasant command. Poor Estelle! And then, to crown all, the frequent presence of the snub-nosed omad'haun, and the mother's extraordinary craze in his favor.

For himself, poor fellow, this time was a time of torture to Caleb. He saw the whole play, and suffered from it as such a man naturally would. Not to gain the kingdom of Heaven for himself would he have forced Estelle's inclination—taking her on her mother's invitation against her own desire. And yet would he have been human not to have desired! Lady Elizabeth alone knew what he felt, and to her alone he showed the hidden wound that was destroying the value of his life—to her, always his goddess, his Madonna, to worship and to serve, to love and adore, but the hem of whose very garment was as sacred as the vest of Isis, and not to be carried to his lips nor touched by his hands.

In this way things were not much advanced, nor did they seem likely to advance. Mrs. Clanricarde offered Estelle to the rich miner as evidently as if she had made the proposal in so many words; Caleb ever more and more distraught by the mother's patent desire, let the sweet poison of that proffered and yet self-forbidden presence creep nearer and nearer to his soul. Estelle's revulsion against him grew stronger with her mother's increased advocacy; Charlie Osborne's feverish despair grew greater as the sacrilege, which now all Kingshouse was discussing, seemed almost possible. Those stolen meetings were becoming rarer and more perilous, and everything seemed slipping down the decline. Like that village on the slopes of Etna which is kept from sliding down into the valley solely by that huge buttressing rock in front, so, in Caleb's steadfast delicacy and the very unselfishness of his resolve, was the only salvation of the lovers. When the day should come, if it ever should, when passion would be stronger than this unselfishness, then would the sun see the last of the poor young lovers' happiness—Charlie's death-knell and Estelle's enduring martyrdom.

"Nothing could tempt you to such a sacrilege, Estelle?" Charlie asked, as he had asked a dozen times before. Lovers' assurances are never enough.

"Nothing," she answered, with fervor. "I am very sorry we are so poor, very sorry that mother is so anxious, but I would no more marry Caleb Stagg than I would jump into the river. I would rather jump into the river, indeed!"

"I do not want to speak harshly of your mother, but I must say she astonishes me!" said Charlie, tossing back his hair. "The only excuse I can make for her is to suppose she is a little off her head. The idea of her thinking of your marrying that cad, still less wishing it! Good heavens, I wonner she is not struck dead for such a crime!" he said, excitedly. "It makes my blood curdle, Estelle, and would, even if I did not love you!"

"It is too dreadful to think of!" said Estelle, shuddering. "But, Charlie dear, do not distress yourself. I would rather die than do it."

"Or come with me, which would be better than dying," he said, looking up into her face.

She stole her hand gently in his, her shy little hand with the pointed fingers and rose-pink nails like transparent shells.

"A great deal," she said, softly, and for a moment caressed the idea as possible.

That empty purse dangling between them both, as powerful a line of separation as was ever Sigurk's sword, was forgotten, and only the sweet vision of life and love together remained as fair as Geraldine's pale face seen by Surrey in the magic mirror, as delusive as Rose Mary's picture in the beryl stone.

"And you will not, Estelle?" Charlie sank his voice to the softest tones of which spoken music is capable. "With you by my side," he continued, "I could work as I have never worked before, and do great things. It is all this miserable suspense that kills me! The wretched associations to which I am doomed! If I had but you! Ah, Estelle! it is more than one man's life and love that is sacrificed to these criminal arrangements of society. It is the world's great work! Think! I could do something to make my life splendid and my name famous, and you say you will not have it! Estelle, will you not brave everything and come with me? Would you rather see me die of this fever and yourself the wife of Caleb Stagg?"

"Oh, Charlie, how cruel you are!" was all that Estelle could say. Tears were in her voice as well as in her eyes, and Charlie was in the mood when to make the beloved suffer is some kind of balm to one's own pains.

"It seems like it," he returned, again tossing back his hair. "That cad lives in your pocket. All Kingshouse is talking of it, and your mother is offering you to him as if you were a bunch of flowers or a basket of fruit for sale. It is disgusting, it is maddening; and you expect me to stand it! I wonder at myself that I do not put a bullet through the fellow's head. That is what he deserves!"

"But he does not make love to me, Charlie!" said Estelle, earnestly, less moved to this advocacy for care for the truth, or even for the sake of poor Caleb himself, and to defend him against a false imputation, than to give peace to her lover's tortured mind. "He is always most distant and respectful—almost hideously so. He does not make love in any way, by word or look."

"And your mother offers you, as she does, to a fellow who has not even the grace to acknowledge the prize you are!" cried Charlie, his sails filling on the other tack.

"That is better than presumption," said Estelle, softly, and "less disagreeable to me."

"And you can live in such an atmosphere!" cried Charlie. "You know what I suffer, and yet you can support it."

"What can I do, dear?" she asked, in her sweet, gentle way. "I cannot forbid my mother to ask him to the house. It would only make her angry, and do no good! I must just trust to myself, as I have done all along. I will never be false to you, Charlie—never!"

"You swear that!" said Charlie, holding her hands as in a vice.

"Yes, I swear it," she returned.

"By your hopes of salvation you will be true to me, and me only?"

"I will!" she said, her cheeks pale with the very fervor of her vow.

"No one shall ever take you from me?"

"No one! no one!" she repeated.

"Kiss me, Estelle, on this," he said. "You have solemnly vowed yourself to me, remember! You are mine in the sight of God and heaven, and if you deceive me you will commit a great and shameful crime. No man can now call you wife but me, without your perjury your infidelity too gross to give it a name. Now I hold you mine forever! forever."

"You always have," said Estelle, simply. "Ever since we were boy and girl together I have loved you, Charlie, and you know it. I could not love any one else!"

"Nor I, than you," he answered. "Women think they have all the constancy, but they have not. Men are far more constant than the mass of them, and just as constant as the rest. And it counts far more with us than with you, for we have more temptation."

"Yes," said Estelle, dutifully, and her lover caught the word on his lip, and kept it there with his own.

Talks such as these were the very wine of life to Charlie. He drooped and flagged without them, and felt as if all the forces of God and nature were arrayed against him. When he had had this spell of refreshment he was another man. He knew how much she loved him. For all their lives this love had been the main fact of feeling. It had grown with their growth from childhood up to now, full youth. He had no fear of any one, indeed, but himself. Should he ever be able to keep a wife? Times were bad for art. They always are to the mediocre artist, and he had not yet got his foot securely placed on one of all the rungs of the great ladder of success that he had tried to mount. Should he ever? With a heart that failed him on a climb; with cheeks which flushed a hectic red on small exertion; with that cough which so often tormented him; that fever which so often consumed him? Nevertheless, he loved, and he had the lover's unconscious and imperative selfishness. As now, when he held Estelle to his heart at the parting of the ways, and made her swear again and again, by all her hopes of salvation, that she would be true to him, for time and eternity—true to him as he to her, and that she would never marry any one else, so help her God!—so might God do to her as she to him if ever she forsook him, her own true love!

CHAPTER IX.

IN DOUBT AND DREAD.

Allured by Mrs. Clanricarde, spurred on by his father—who, however, was in a wrong latitude altogether—conscious of the "res angusta" in the home of her he loved, and without present means of his own to help her secretly, as else he would, personally loathed by Estelle, and knowing that he was, while he himself loved her as such a man naturally would love a girl raised above him by origin, and placed within his power to protect by fortune, poor Caleb's sense of general haze and confusion, perplexity and indecision rendered his life at this moment a real tragedy—if we allow that feelings are so tragic as events.

Yet often the flattering thought passed through his brain, like a shooting-star cleaving the dark heavens before his eyes, "I would make her so good a husband; I would so tenderly care for her; so guard her from all pain and trouble. I would worship her and reverence her so deeply that in time she would learn to care for me. And if she could never love me as I love her, she would at least come to peace with herself and forbearance with me. I would love her so that she must in time love me!"

Man ever makes the same mistake, and the loving think that the very gift of love—its very passion and intensity—perforce must win return. Oh, fools and blind! who water the barren rock with your heart's blood, and look for the rare red rose as your reward! As if reluctant love ever was bought, even by love! as if the heart was not its own free gift, and gratitude for an unshared affection but so much snow new-fallen on the ice! Love may burn at the stake and die a beggar for the beloved; it may stand on the pillory and be pelted by the world for consorting with the base-minded and disfavored; it may give its all—faith, home and fame—as freely as our dying hero gave that cup of water to the wounded soldier. But by the force of its own strength only will it gain nothing in return. Can the sun compel the dew, save by the free gift of the generous earth? Does it rise at his bidding from the shores of the Dead Sea, from the sand of the desert, from the marble rocks of Pentelicus? Yet the same glory pours down on these as on that flowerful meadow—that fragrant garden, where the dew lies thick like living jewels—that lavish boon of beauty given out by the earth in voluntary response. So with love. If not spontaneous, it is not to be compelled, and the heart sheds its blood in vain.

How to Get Square Shoulders.

A young woman whose employment made it necessary that she should stoop while at work said to herself one day, "I discover that I am growing round shouldered. Now that never must be. But what shall I do about it? I know. I have read that Oriental women have a beautiful carriage, and so have Mexicans and negresses; they are erect and hold their heads high, and it is because they carry water jars and great bundles on their heads, balancing them without any help from the hands. What they do, I can with practice; I will begin with a heavy book and see if I can walk across the room without steadying it with my hand."

She had struck a right idea. Dr. Dio Lewis says of the "crook" of the shoulders:

"There is one good way to cure it. Shoulder braces will not help. * * I know of but one bull's eye shot. It is to carry a weight on the head. A sheep skin or other strong bag filled with twenty or more pounds of sand is a good weight. * * * When engaged in your morning studies * * put this bag of sand on your head, hold your head erect, draw your chin close to your neck and walk slowly about the room. * * The muscles, whose duty it is to hold head and shoulders erect are hit, not with scattering shot, but with a rifle ball. The bones of the spine * * will soon accommodate themselves to the new attidude. One year of daily practice half an hour morning and evening will give you a noble carriage."

Use of the Beaver's Tail.

It is a common belief that the beaver uses its tail as a trowel to plaster the mud on the walls of its house and dam. Captain Hardy studied the habits of the animal in Nova Scotia some time ago, and came to the conclusion that this opinion was not well founded.

The vulgar opinion that the broad tail of the beaver was used to plaster down the mud in its work has long since been pronounced erroneous. Its real use is evidently to counterpoise, by an action against the water in an upward direction, the tendency to sink, headforemost, when propelling itself through the water by its powerful and webbed hind feet, and at the same time supporting the load of mud or stones in its forepaws under the chin.

Our Indians laughed at the idea of the trowel story. That, and the assertion that the tail is likewise used as a vehicle for materials, may be considered as exploded notions.—Youth's Companion.

Stone Fruits.

It is the seed that exhausts in fruit production, says American Cultivator. This is especially true of large seeds enclosed in stones. The proportion of seed to the fruit is proportionately greater in the cherry, plum and peach than in the apple or pear. In the development of seeds potash is very essential. Trees that overbear have the growth of their fruit checked at just the point where such development ought to begin. In the grape vine the exhaustion from overbearing causes the vine to mildew and refuse to ripen either fruit or wood. Thinning the bunches early and applying a liberal dose of potash salts are the best preventives of this diseased condition of the vine.

Not Responsible.

Mother—To think that my little Ethel should have spoken so impertinently to papa to-day at dinner! She never hears me talk in that way to him.

Ethel (stoutly)—Well, but you choosed him, and I didn't.

The Sleighing Season.

When a little cold would p'ease us,
When we sigh for bracing breezes,
There is nothing more depressing than a January thaw
When for days and days together
We have miserable weather,
And the rain is dripping, dripping, and the air is damp and raw

How it makes the pulses tingle
Just to hear the sleigh-bells jingle,
And to see the horses prancing o'er the ice-incrusted snow,
Their finest paces showing,
The drivers noses glowing,
To hear the merry laughter and the shouts g lang! and ho!

How it makes the heart to flutter
To be seated in a cutter
With a young and charming damsel—who'd object to be so placed?—
Behind a pair of pacers,
Leading all the other racers,
With one arm the horses guiding and the other round her waist!

Most delicious situation!
Most delightful occupation
There nothing does with greater joy the lover's bosom fill.
But in it there always is,
Short-lived indeed the joy is,
For after it is over must be paid the livery bill.

How Lincoln Signed the Pledge.

We have a pleasant account of Lincoln signing the pledge. A personal friend of Mr. Lincoln told Mrs. Lucy Rider Meyer, President of the Chicago Missionary Training School, that Old Uncle John, as he was called, an itinerant temperance lecturer in southern Illinois nearly two generations ago, on one occasion, speaking in an isolated country district, probably in the schoolhouse, offered the temperance pledge, as was his custom, at the close of the meeting; whereupon a tall, lank, awkward youth came forward and affixed his name. Years after, when he had come to great renown, Abraham Lincoln, meeting Uncle John, said to him: "I owe more to you than to almost any one else of whom I can think, for if I had not signed the pledge with you in my years of youthful temptation, I might have gone the way that the majority of my old comrades have gone, which ends in a drunkard's life and a drunkard's grave."

His conduct when receiving notification of his nomination to the presidency is a part of history. A friend, knowing that he never kept wine in his house, and, thinking it an absolute necessity on so great an occasion, had some in readiness to present to the committee who formally notified Lincoln of his nomination. But Mr. Lincoln quietly set it aside and, ordering a pitcher of water and glasses, filled them and passed them to his guests, saying: "We will drink to the fortunes of our party in the best beverage ever brewed for man."—Exchange.

Trees with Large Leaves.

Trees of the palm family have larger leaves than any others. The Insja palm, which grows on the banks of the Amazon, has leaves which reach a length of from thirty to fifty feet and are ten or twelv feet in breadth. Specimens of the leaves of the Talipot palm, a native of Ceylon, have been met with that were twenty feet long and eighteen feet broad. These leaves are used by the natives to make tents and form very efficient shelters from the rain. The leaves of the double cocoanut palm are often thirty feet long and several feet wide. When the wind is strong they clash together with a noise that may be heard at great distance. Only one leaf is produced each year, and they are so firmly attached to the stem of the tree and so strong in themselves that a man may sit on the end of one and rock to and fro in perfect safety.—New York Telegram.

No Respect for Bogeys.

The bogey and the bad man have passed finally out of the lives of children. You cannot scare the small boy any more with any such imaginative terrors. An anxious mother has just lost her last bit of control over her child by a "bluff" which did not work. She did not know her boy. She quite undervalued his experience in human nature. The boy was naughty.

She had exhausted all appeals to his imagination, and finally she had recourse to practical terrors. She threatened to call the policeman, and she painted the prison cell and all sorts of things.

"Yah!" said the boy. "Mamma, you can't play the policeman on me. He gave me a lot of candy yesterday. He wouldn't run me in for anything

Eccentric Requirements in a Will.

The will of the late Wm. F. Foote, of Parsons, Penn., which was admitted to probate on the 22nd inst., provides that no crape shall be used at his funeral, and that there shall be no signs of mourning of any kind—no minister, no flowers, nor any kind of religious service. Furthermore, he wanted to be buried in a plain wooden coffin, without nails, and no hearse to be used. He desired the remains to be taken to the cemetery in his old spring waggon, drawn by his horse Bill. He also wanted to be placed in his coffin on his side.—Philadelphia Record.

The Latest Thing in Kid Gloves.

Kid gloves with odd piece insertions form the latest craze. The edge next the elbow is beautifully dovetailed with bits of kid of a color contrasting to the body of the glove. The effect is decidedly striking, to say the least. Gentlemen do not wear gloves of this description.—New York Evening Sun.

THE LADIES' COLUMN.

Foods Which Will Add to the Beauty of the Fair Sex.

WHAT THE GIRLS CAN DO.

Tears Touch Him!

A woman in tears makes the stoutest masculine heart quail. Tears are woman's weapons, and she seldom loses her cause after resorting to them. There is something peculiar about the fact. A little girl will rush into the house and ask papa for a quarter "to buy a new dolly 'cause the other one was smashed." If he refuses she will curl up her under lip, her eyes will flood with tears, and papa's hand goes right down into his pocket for the coveted quarter, and the tot is made happy. The little girl's brother will sidle up to papa for a dime to get a new ball. Being refused the boy sets up a howl, cries lustily, and papa's hand reaches out and the boy gets—a sound thrashing.

Man's Opinion About Dress.

Said a woman the other day: "I would rather have a man's opinion about my gowns any time than a woman's. He does not know once out of a hundred times what the material is or what it is worth. He does know, however, whether or not it is becoming. Now, a woman will sit up in your room and tell you what a beautiful gown it is. All the while she is looking you over from head to foot, saying to herself that the gown cost so much, the trimmings so much and the buttons so much. You can see that she thinks she could have bought the gown for $20 less and have it made up in a much prettier way. If the gown pleases a man he shows it in his looks."

Some Beautifying Foods.

Women ought to be lettuce lovers, for this salad not only purifies the blood and cools the color but steadies the nerves, and ought to be taken at night to insure sound sleep. It is a better, safer nervine than opium or chloral, taking for this purpose the older, darker leaves. One notable cosmetic and regulating dose, which dates as far back as good Queen Mary of Orange, is the juice of sugar beets, boiled, peeled, sliced and set before the fire to draw the rich, sirupy juice out. This in tablespoonful doses once an hour, with as much acid wine, lemon juice or port wine as agreeable, is said to be the material for making pure blood next to fresh grape juice. Of course, anything that makes new, rich blood is a fine tonic also, and plenty of fresh beets in salad will add plumpness to the scrawniest form, provided the beets are boiled tender, and slowly eaten. Thick beet juice with a few drops of lemon juice is a nice application for the cheeks to soften them and preserve their color. This and the vegetable lotions generally are allowed to dry on the face as long as may be before washing off. Sallow complexions often need only the sun to bleach them and brighten their roses. The sallowness of women past youth often calls for this prescription more than anything. The sallowness of young unmarried women comes of torpid liver, and is treated by outdoor work and a free use of lemons, acid fruit and dandelion extract. The ashen-sallow face, with glassy eyes and blue shades under them is nature's admission of excess, and demands immediate change, a simple, unexciting life, with the mind drawn off to new interests, or the woman will become a sacrifice, a broken-down toy speedily.

How to Keep Flowers.

A great deal has been written on the preservation of cut flowers, but the matter is still imperfectly understood by most people. It is important to know, not only how to take care of them after being cut, but how to cut them. On this latter point a practical hint may be of service. It might not occur to them that it made any serious difference whether the stems were broken off or cut with a knife or scissors. A sharp knife is the right tool for this purpose, as it leaves the sap-vessels of the stems open for the absorption of water, while scissors crush and compress these vessels so that their absorptive power is more or less destroyed. Like injury may be done by breaking off the stems.

Cut flowers often suffer from too dry atmosphere. It is difficult to avoid this in our artificially heated rooms, but we may at least put the blossoms in the coolest part of the room. Near a window, and especially in a bay window, the temperature is generally several degrees lower than in other parts of the room, as you will see if you test it with a thermometer. The best authorities say, moreover, that the flowers should have the benefit of light, and even of sunshine in most cases, though there is popular prejudice against exposing them to the latter. On the other hand, they suffer, as plants do, from sudden alterations of temperature and from draughts.

In the case of blossoms that fall to pieces easily, it is a good idea to let fall a drop of gum or mucilage into the centre, which will keep the petals together at the base. To prevent this from running out before it hardens, the flowers should be kept upright by putting their stems through the bottom of a sieve or sticking them in sand. With the aid of a camel's hair brush or a pointed stick a large number of flowers may be gummed in a short time.

When flowers have been carried a long distance in close boxes or cases they often appear withered and worthless, but with proper treatment they may be revived and restored to their original beauty. Instead of at once being put into vases and exposed to the hot, dry air of the parlor, they should either be spread out on wet flannel or moss and covered with a dish cover or inverted box, or else put in pans containing moss and water or wet sand, in which they can be set upright, and then shut up in the dark for a few hours. If they do not regain their freshness under this nursing there is no hope for them, but in all ordinary cases their recovery is certain.

A Daughter's Duties.

No words can describe the meanness of a man who would ask any girl to do anything clandestine, whether correspondence or meetings, and no true girl should so far forget what is due to herself or her mother as for a moment to sanction it. If you value your soul, your eternal happiness, or even your position in society, turn back and unbosom yourselves to your mother.

And then the mother's cares are many, and she may be breaking down. There are daughters who can lie abed to refresh themselves in order that they can gad about the streets and look at the young men, but unfortunate will be the young man who marries a girl that leaves the burden of life on her mother.

O, the fathers! The average father has a hard lot, and how much a daughter can do to make his path through life more easy. His income may not be large, but he will generally be willing to go down for his last dollar to make his daughters comfortable. He is generally too proud to let them know his struggles, but suppose you do this: Go throw your arms around his neck and ask him, "Can you afford to dress us as we dress now, are we embarrassing you—tell us, father? You are toiling too hard and we can do without a spring dress. Don't work so hard for us."

Daughters, wake up. Don't let him kill himself because you are a spendthrift.

All through the month of January dustmen swept the streets of Boston and New York; on the 10th, in Olympia, Washington territory, twenty-two varieties of flowers were picked in the open air; farmers ploughed in Massachusetts, violets bloomed in New England and peas were two inches above ground on Long Island. In this city buds of the arbutus and pansies in bloom were picked on Jan. 28th. The month was 5° warmer than for forty six years. On Feb. 5th, the pussy-willow blossomed in Connecticut, and in Norwich the same day the buds of the magnolia were an inch long, and Japan quinces were opening their buds. On the 10th a rose bush full of buds was seen at Easton, Pa., a dahlia in full bloom at Scranton, dandelions at Easton and grasshoppers at Bethlehem. On the 20th at Providence the chickweed, snowdrop and violets were in bud or blossom. March 1st brought early radishes to the market at Alton, Ill.

I., and grasshoppers seen in Westport, Mass. February 17th, snowdrops in bloom in Boston Highlands, and on the 26th crocuses in bloom at Salem, Mass.—Taunton Gazette.

Kind in Her Cruelty.

The most aggrieved woman in all England at present is Mary Ann Proudly, who lives in a town called Bootle. She was passionately attached to a cat, and this very attachment augmented the wrath and amazement of a neighbor, who observed her with one blow of a hatchet cut off the cat's tail. In court there were many to testify that Miss Proudly had been loving to the cat since cutting off its tail. She said the cat was troubled in its mind and would soon have gone mad but for her prompt action. Every cat, she tearfully informed the learned magistrate, had a worm in its tail, which can go up to its brain and drive it mad. You can tell when the worm begins to travel, because then the cat begins to run around after its tail. Under such circumstances the only thing to do is to cut the tail off above the worm, and she had reluctantly adopted this course. Its efficacy, she thought, was proven by the fact that the cat had ceased to run after its tail.

The magistrate administered a fine of forty shillings and costs, on the ground that cruelty is not excusable because based on superstition. The balance of public opinion in Bootle, which accepts the worm theory, is with Miss Proudly.

Lafayette Frederick shot his wife dead at Quincy, Ill., yesterday, and then committed suicide. He travelled for a St. Louis medicine house. His wife went to Quincy to visit a sister. Five minutes before the crime the couple were laughing and talking with each other. No cause is shown for the murder.

NICARAGUA'S PUBLIC LAUNDRY.

A Volcanic Lake Where Native Beauties Are Seen Unadorned on Wash Days.

(Nicaraguan Correspondence of Philadelphia Record.)

The horses were again urged forward and upward towards the point where the distant peak of Santa Clar towers above the clouds till at last the crest of an extinct crater was reached. Within this hollow, 100 feet below the surrounding ridge, which forms a circular basin with a diameter of about six hundred yards, as perfect as if laid out by accurate measurement, lies a lake of unknown depth. A little way from the bank sounding leads have been run down 300 feet without touching bottom. We are told that at times the water becomes warm and that sulphurous fumes arise from its surface, and again the volume of the lake will rise five or six feet so suddenly that the women washing along the shore have to swim for their lives, leaving the clothes to float away. Though called extinct, this would indicate that the temper of the volcano is still too uncertain to make its immediate neighborhood a desirable place of residence.

This lake—called Tiscapa—is the public laundry of Nicaragua's capital, and here the lavendarias (washwomen) come to cleanse the city's soiled linen. A rugged roadway leads down to the water, where at all hours of every day a novel scene is presented. Standing knee-deep or waist-deep in the water, dressed (or, rather, undressed) accordingly, the native women pound the clothes on flat stones and afterwards dry them on the surrounding bushes. The industrious workers are themselves the most striking pictures, clad in but a single short, sleeveless and extremely "low-necked" garment, and even this slight trammeling they discard in the ardor of business if compelled to seek deeper rinsing places. Honi soit qui mal y pense. And these creatures seem to be the perfection of innocence, for they remain entirely undisturbed if, perchance, a company of passing muleteers descend the mountain path and proceed to water their beasts and bathe themselves as unconcernedly and unnoticed by the women as though each were alone in the wilderness.

Among these workers, ranging in age from maidens of 12 to matrons of 50, one may see some surprising beauties, whose advent in New York in civilized attire would turn the heads and capture the hearts of all the dudes of that beauty-adorning metropolis. Though the Phœnician blood, which Nicaraguans are so proud to claim, is probably lost in the now more clearly defined Spanish and Indian, in these mild-eyed, sweet-faced and graceful children of Central America have retained in their characters many of the traits that distinguished their earlier ancestors, including simple contentment and a passionate enjoyment of nature and love of home.

Motes in Sunbeams.

Counting the dancing motes in a bar of sunlight sounds like one of those hopeless, never-ending tasks with which malignant fairies delight to break the spirits of little heroines in the German fairy stories. Something more than this, however, has been achieved by modern science, which is now able to count the particles floating in any given portion of the atmosphere, and determine what proportion of these are dangerous germs and what are mere dust. Dr. Frankland's curious experiments have shown us how to count the micro-organisms, and now John Aitken, of Falkirk, by a totally different method, has been able to take stock of the more harmless but hardly less interesting dust motes. Thirty thousand such particles have been detected by him in the thousandth of a cubic inch of the air of a room. In the outside atmosphere in dry weather the same measurement of air yielded 2,117, whereas, after a heavy rainfall, the number was only 321. That this power of prying into atmospheric secrets will eventually yield very important results must be obvious to all. Among the most curious discoveries already made is the direct relation between dust particles and fogs, mist and rain.—New York Tele-

He Might Have Known Better.

Two newspaper men met in their official capacity at a swell reception on the South Side the other evening. They had been directed to a private apartment on the second floor of the house, and after a time the hostess tore herself away from her guests in the drawing-room below to give the reporters the information they sought. She took her list of acceptances and allowed them to copy it as a list of those present. Just as the scribes were about to depart a messenger boy came with a note for the hostess. She read it and said to the reporters: "Here is a note from a gentleman who sent me an acceptance; he writes that he deeply regrets his inability to be present, but that he is too ill and tired after a day of hard work. Too bad. I think, gentlemen, you had better cross his name from your lists." One of the scribes asked who he was. "Col. ——," answered the hostess. "Why," blurted out the second reporter, "I just saw him over to Mrs. ——'s reception, on the North Side." He probably did not mean to do it, but he had certainly, in the eyes of the hostess, pushed the Colonel over the edge of the tureen into the pottage.—Chicago Herald.

The National Flower.

Foreign Visitor—"What is your national flower?"

Minneapolis Belle—"Wheat."

Thomas B. Merry, of Portland, who was the Oregon commissioner to the Melbourne Exhibition, has arrived from Australia and declares the exhibition a dead failure. Over $7,000,000 was lost in the undertaking, and the building will be closed at the end of this month instead of remaining open to June next, as contemplated. The exhibition was conceived on a vast scale. The old exhibition building was a magnificent structure of brick and stone, covering ten acres. In 1872 the world's exposition was held in it, and proved successful. Last year Melbourne decided to outvie all previous efforts, and put up buildings which covered an additional twenty acres, making in all an exhibition covering thirty acres. The idea was good, the manner in which it was carried out excellent, but the judgment was bad, for the colonies combined had not sufficient population to make such a gigantic undertaking a financial success.

TELEGRAPHIC SUMMARY.

Lord Lytton, British Ambassador, has informed M. Goblet, French Foreign Minister, that Great Britain has not annexed two of the Tongway Islands.

A duel was fought yesterday between Cornudett, member of the Chamber of Deputies for the Department of the Creuse, and Chabrouillaud, an editor. The latter was wounded. The men had quarrelled about the candidacy of Boulanger.

Lord Rosebery, in a speech at Scarborough, said that the British elector liked to chew the cud of politics, and it seemed likely that at the end of his rumination he would be in favor of Home Rule. The speaker confirmed from his own personal knowledge the extracts quoted in Pierrepont's diary from a conversation with Disraeli, in which the latter favored giving Ireland something like an American State Legislature.

Mr. Gladstone, who is in Naples, in reply to a correspondent who had called his attention to the fact that a branch of the Irish National League had been named after him, writes: I have no connection of any sort with the League, nor have I an knowledge whatsoever upon the subject. I suppose my name was chosen, owing to my efforts to free the Irish from oppressive laws such as are absolutely certain to produce objectionable acts on the part of some Irishmen, the fewness of which I only wonder at and feel thankful for.

It is intended to hold at Columbia Tenn., on May 8th, a congress of the Scotch-Irish race to revive memories and to compile a history of the race, showing its impress on American civilization.

Two of Sims Reeves' Anecdotes.

One night after dutifully escorting an aunt of his home on an "outside" car, he tendered the driver the legal fare, viz., sixpence. The Jehu regarded the coin with disgust, then said: "Sure, the drive ye've had's worth more than this now."

"It's your legal fare," said the practical doctor. "But the lady, sir," said Pat, with a sly wink, "wouldn't ye give more on her account now?" "Oh, she's my aunt." "Well," responded the carman with lofty contempt, "if that's all you'll give for your aunt, I pity your uncle."

On another occasion, being late for a dinner engagement, Fraser rushed into the street and hailing a car said to the carman, "Drive fast, I am late for dinner." He was brought to his destination so rapidly that he felt as though, like Mahomet's coffin, he was between earth and air. The inevitable sixpence was tendered.

"Why, sir," said the carman in an aggrieved tone, "the mare would go home tail foremost if she saw this coin. Thank God she's blind." "Well, it's your legal fare, my man." "Yes," muttered the carman, mounting the box seat, "it's the legal fare, bad luck to yur larnin;" then raising his voice as he drove off, "May be it's a good thing for ye that ye're going where you'll get a dinner for nothing."

ERRATA.—In the letter of last week a couple of slight errors occurred. Speaking of Edinboro Castle the item referring to its accommodation should have read: The castle can accommodate 2,000 soldiers and has an armory with space for 30,000 arms."

One of the most interesting sights in Edinburgh is the palace and abbey of Holyrood. This venerable seat of Scottish royalty dates its origin as far back as 1128, but the abbey church, now roofless, is all that remains of the original edifice. Entering the palace under a handsome cupola, we were shown into the picture gallery, a large apartment containing about a hundred portraits of Scottish kings, from Fergus I. to James VII., besides a number of historical paintings. We next went through Lord Darnley's rooms to Queen Mary's apartment, which are the most interesting in the palace. They are preserved in the same state as when she occupied them. Passing through the audience chamber we entered the bedroom. The bed hangings, once rich and costly, are now rotten with age. We were shown some of the Queen's needle work preserved in a cabinet in the same room. Off the bed chamber we entered a little room where the Queen was at supper with Rizzio the night he was murdered by Darnley and his conspirators. He was dragged from this room to the door of the audience chamber and there dispatched with over fifty wounds. We were shown a dark stain in the floor, said to mark the spot with his blood.

In the supper room we saw Bothwell's suit of armor and his sword, all remarkably large and heavy.

The church, or Chapel Royal, is now roofless except the belfry tower, but the walls are in a good state of preservation, especially the west front, which is in the most beautiful style of early English architecture. A row of tombs in the main aisle mark the graves of a number of the Scottish nobility, and in the vault below lie the remains of several kings, queens and other illustrious personages.

Next morning we visited the old Parliament buildings, now used for Supreme Courts. The great hall has a fine roof of carved oak, finished 250 years ago, and its exquisite workmanship reminded me of Longfellow's lines,

In the ancient days of art
Workmen wrought with greatest care
All the unseen hidden part,
For the Gods see everywhere

The site of the Parliament buildings and the adjacent square was formerly the ancient churchyard of St. Giles, and in the centre of the square there is a fine equestrian statute of Charles II., and near to it a stone, on and level with the pavement, with the letters IX, 1572. This is all that marks the grave of the famous preacher and reformer, John Knox. We saw his house on High street, an ancient building, the upper stairway protruding into the street. over the door is an inscription spelt thus:—"Lofe God above al, and your nichtbour as ye-self." This house was the manse provided for the Scottish reformer when elected minister of Edinburg, and from its projecting window he sometimes preached to the throngs in this crowded thoroughfare. We next visited St. Giles' Cathedral. Entering the naive we saw hanging from the roof scores of old banners, the colors of Scottish regiments which had been borne on many a hard fought field in all parts of the world, and beneath our feet many a Scotch hero lies buried, but the monuments around us tell how many more in far off lands had fought and died for home and father land. A brass plate near the chair marks the place where Jenny Geddes sat on her cutty stool the day she began the fight against episcopy. Next to St Giles, if not equal to it in interest, is the old Grey Friar's church where the first signatures to the National Covenant were appended in 1638. We went to it next, crossing the densely populated Cowgate near the Grass Market, by a bridge which forms a fine street connecting the two hillsides between which the Cowgate runs. In the chruchyard we found an inscription on an old monument relating how about a hundred noblemen, gentlemen, ministers and others, "Noble martyrs for Jesus Christ," were executed at Edinburg at the time of the Restoration and buried here. This same old church was used as a prison in which nearly a thousand covenanters were confined and many of them perished here of want, wounds or disease; others were executed and the remainder banished or sold to the slave plantations of the West Indies.

I stand upon my balcony,
  My tea gown softly flutters ;
Perhaps it might be wise to stand
  Inside the oaken shutters.
And yet, though I can see her face,
  I hear no word she utters.

Her white hand rests upon the gate,
  Her smooth cheek flushes brightly
His breath a cloud of little bangs
  Is swaying very slightly ;
And he ? Well, he's the favored one
  For whom her gas burns nightly.

Amusing love of early youth,
  So fresh, so bright, so vernal !
Such faith in all, such love and truth,
  To me it seems supernal.
For I have lived to learn that naught
  On earth is quite eternal.

My dears, some day you'll know with me
  That love flames just in flashes ;
That time has glowing sandalled feet,
  That burns all things to ashes
That faith and truth are lights that shine
  Only beneath youth's lashes.

Yet standing here, just out of sight,
  (Duenna and adviser) ;
I watch you silly two to-night
  As gold the envious miser,
And find myself (oh ! breathe it light,
  In tears that I am wiser

ESTELLE'S INFATUATION :

A NOVEL.

And all this Caleb knew, as well as he knew that the chrysalis must develop according to its own laws, and that folding it in rose leaves or cushioning it on satin will be of no avail if the hour of its butterfly birth has not come. Yet he suffered himself to be at times deceived by hope and desire, and the mirage which looked as if it might be real !

Caleb's father wanted him to take Lady Elizabeth for a wife, but the young man knew that any lady whatever of the Kingshouse would be welcome; and Estelle in her pearly grace and beauty more welcome than another.

"Thou shalt have it all, lad," Miles used to say, as his biggest bribe. "If thou'st shamed of thy own, thou shalt have it all to thyself and my lady yonder. Grapes and peaches, furniture and land, nags and coaches, I'll not keep the value of a brass farthing from thee, more nor I and thy mother'll want for our old age. A clean shirt o' Sundays, lad, and a good glass for a friend, that's all I ask out of the many thousands as we have. Only let me see thee mated with the best in the land, and I'll die content."

But when Caleb said, as he did once, "Give me something of my own now, father; out of so much you could well spare me a few hundreds in my pocket," Miles answered him back by such a turbid stream of abuse and objurgation that he never ventured to repeat the experiment.

"All, if thou'lt give me a lady for my daughter," he said. "All, dost hear, jackass? but by the Lord not so much as 'll buy thee a crust of bread while thou bides here as my son in my house. I'll be my own ganger and captain of my own ship as long as I'm at the head. I'll give way to thee the day thou hast thy wife, but not an hour sooner. So now you know."

Which declaration only increased the poor omad'haun's general perplexity when matched with Mrs. Clanricarde's hints—as broad as cart-wheels, according to Caleb's unspoken simile—and only his own consciousness of unworthiness to keep him steady to his self-imposed negation.

CHAPTER X.

THE CROSSING OF THE RUBICON.

Things financial at Les Saules had gone from bad to worse. Mr. Clanricarde's last investments, made in faith, had fructified in failure. One turn more of that Stock Exchange screw, and the bailiffs would take possession; and then where would Estelle's matrimonial market be? For beauty, although such a splendid jewel in itself, wants a certain amount of material setting to give it stability; a man with intrinsic advantages looks for some kind of equivalent besides that which, great as it is, can be destroyed forever by an infected laundry or a runaway horse. The value of birth, for instance, is a constant quantity, and the multiplication of riches is potentially infinite; but beauty is as a radiant mass, subject to perpetual shrinkage—a floating capital, slowly but surely diminishing. Hence it needs some kind of background—something beside itself—else would all the fair-faced Cicelys of the milking-pail and handsome Jennies of the spinning mill find as many King Cophetuas as there were moneyed men in the district, and no nut-brown maid would go without her lover who was an earl's son and not "a banished man." And a man in possession, with a father squeezed flat under the Stock Exchange screw, is not exactly the best kind of buttress to be imagined, even for such a monument of loveliness as was Estelle Clanricarde.

All these thoughts, in other forms of words, possessed Mrs. Clanricarde night and day. The peril of the moment, the fear of still further decline, the fact that no one else was at hand—all made her resolve to bring about this hideous marriage, whereof, however, the present prominent obstacle was Caleb's own unconquerable shyness. Shyness—not disinclination. Mrs. Clanricarde was too astute not to see the difference. The latter would perhaps have daunted even her. The former was no more to be regarded than a child's fear of the dark, to which it was analogous. Of Estelle herself the mother had no grave doubts. For all her suspicions of that underground rivulet of love still flowing between her and Charlie, she did not mistrust the weight of her own influence when the time for using it should have come. It was Caleb, not Estelle, that had to be conquered, the man to be encouraged not the woman to be coerced, which made the whole position more embarrassing, and the tactics to be pursued more difficult. But time and need pressed, and something must be done.

Accordingly an invitation to dinner was sent to the heir of Redhill.

The long summer evening was favorable to confidential talk, as well as redolent of love. Mrs. Clanricarde left Estelle in the drawing-room, and proposed a little stroll in the garden with Mr. Stagg. Like the pimpernel before a shower, like birds and beasts before a storm, Caleb, sensitive and double sensed, knew that a crisis was at hand. Everything showed it. Mrs. Clanricarde's almost oppressive kindness; her husband's evidently forced attempt to follow suit; Estelle's unconcealed depression—the fear, the scorn, the prayers, the loathing, that passed in changing waves of feeling over her face—whence all pity was banished in the passion of her own pain; yes, they stood on the brink of the great Rubicon, and Caleb knew that it would be passed to-night. And how should he bear himself? What should he do? The girl would be offered to him by her mother, and passionately denied by herself, and he would have to choose between saving her position and sacrificing her person, or respecting her feelings and letting her fortunes be destroyed. He did not think of himself. His sole perplexity was, what was best for her.

The handsome, brisk, and hard-pressed lady shut her eyes to all that stood against her. She would not let herself be troubled. Her future son-in-law, when he forgot himself—and he was so preoccupied that he forgot himself very often—ate with his knife, then helped himself to salt on the tip, picked his teeth with his fingers, bit his bread without breaking it, drank with his unwiped lips and a full mouth, tossed off his custard like wine, and spooned his cherry tart like so much porridge; then remembering his offence, he blushed till his sandy hair looked washed with red, and became so confused and humiliated he did not understand what was said to him, nor could he have answered if he had understood.

"Trifles light as gossamer webs!" thought Mrs. Clanricarde. "But those solid thousands are facts."

"I cannot tell you how glad I am that we have come to know you better," she said, when she had him alone and safe in the garden, bending her vivacious black eyes with as much maternal tenderness as she could command on the miserable creature at her side.

"You are very kind, Mrs. Clanricarde," said Caleb, feeling that he must say something.

"We have the highest possible esteem and affection for you," she continued, still maternal and tender.

"I'm not worth it," stammered Caleb.

She shook his hand with a fine impulsiveness.

"Don't say that!" she cried, and her voice was both flattering and deprecatory. "You are one of the best and dearest young men I have ever known—a man to trust with one's greatest treasures, and to be sure of in every relation of life. I do not know a fault that you have—but one." Here Caleb opened his round eyes and stared. "And that is your modesty," continued Mrs. Clanricarde. "You are a great deal too modest, my dear Mr. Stagg—but let me call you Caleb; such a fine suggestive name it is!—you do not hold yourself in as high esteem as you should. You are fit to marry a princess."

"Oh, Mrs. Clanricarde!" put in poor Caleb, his modesty bleeding at every pore.

"I can read you, you see," she continued, her smile as soft as swan's-down, and her voice as sweet as honey can make even vinegar. "You do not think yourself worthy of a grand lady, do you?"

"No," said Caleb, in a low voice, "I don't, Mrs. Clanricarde."

"And I do," she replied, her vivacious black eyes levelled again full on his face.

"I am not fit to be the husband of a real lady, Mrs. Clanricarde," returned Caleb, with a pause, speaking with desperate steadiness. "I am naught but a miner's son, and I was naught but a miner myself till I was a grown lad of seventeen. And what's bred in the bone will out in the flesh, Mrs. Clanricarde, and not all father's money can make gentlefolks of us, or fit to go shares with the quality."

Intentionally Caleb went back on the old habit of speech, which was more purely provincial than he had taught himself of late to be.

"You are better than a gentleman," said Mrs. Clanricarde, with desperate steadiness on her own part. "You are a good man, my dear Mr. Caleb."

"I'm a fool, that's what I am, Mrs. Clanricarde," said Caleb.

"Why do you say that?" asked Estelle's mother, doing battle for him against himself.

"I ought never to have let myself be persuaded," said Caleb. "Me and mine are not fit for gentlefolks, and I should have known that, and stuck to the old shop and not come out of it."

"You dear, foolish, modest fellow!" cried Mrs. Clanricarde. "Why, we all love you. You are the delight of the place, for every one in it knows what a good honest creature you are. Look at Lady Elizabeth. Any one would say she was in love with you, for the fuss she makes with you—the affection she has for you," she added, correcting herself.

"Lady Elizabeth is an angel and pities me," said Caleb. "She knows me better than any one, and she is sorry for my false position."

"False! Where is the falseness? Young, rich, clever, good—what does it signify that your father made his own fortune, and that you have not a long line of ancestry behind you? How many of our best men are self-made?"

"Not quite so near the ground as we," said Caleb, still maintaining the self-humiliation, which was but another name for desperation.

"They that humble themselves shall be exalted," said Mrs. Clanricarde; "and so shall you be, my dear young friend."

"Mrs. Clanricarde, ma'am, don't!" cried Caleb, feeling like a drowning man, with the waters closing over his head.

"To show you how highly I esteem and, I may say, love you," Mrs. Clanricarde went on to say; "and to show you, too, how clearly I have read your secret heart, I am going to be your interpreter to yourself. You love Estelle, and are too bashful to say so. Is it not so? Have I not read your secret as I say?"

Caleb's face changed to a very piteousness of embarrassment.

Mrs. Clanricarde laid her hand on his arm, and her slight slim fingers pressed like slender rods of iron into his flesh.

"Is it not so?" she repeated.

"I admire your daughter, Mrs. Clanricarde," stammered Caleb, in a strange voice.

"You love her," insisted Estelle's mother. The poor fellow put up his hands before his face.

"Yes; God help me, I do!" he sobbed.

His guard was beaten down. He was at his adversary's mercy.

"Then you shall marry her," said Mrs. Clanricarde, in tones the cold determination of which no affected tremor could hide.

"How can I, Mrs. Clanricarde!" said Caleb, still behind the mask of his freckled hands. "She doesn't value me. She never could love me. How can I wed her against her will, as it would be?"

"She will learn to love you," said Mrs. Clanricarde. "You are too good a man not to be loved. She respects you already. That is one step gained. The rest will follow."

Caleb slowly shook his head. He was just master enough of himself to disbelieve this flattering promise, sweet as it was—responsive to his own desires as it also was.

"My dear young man, you do not know a woman," said Mrs. Clanricarde, a pitying smile borne like the breath of flowers on her words. "We are such creatures of the heart! We are so easily gained by men! Give such a girl as my Estelle, so sweet and gentle as she is, such a husband as yourself, and in a very short time she will learn to prize and adore you. Your goodness, your patience, your cleverness and knowledge, will all fascinate and win her. I know what I am saying."

Still Caleb held his hands before his face, and slowly shook his sandy-colored head from side to side. Mrs. Clanricarde was beginning to feel doubtful whether her Waterloo would be won or not.

Then she said, fervently, "Believe me, my dear, I speak as a woman, avec connaissance de cause. Once married to you, Estelle will learn to love you, because you will treat her well and because you love her so fondly. Why, my dear Mr. Caleb, what else makes women love but because the man loves them! They do not give their hearts unsought—unwooed. Your love for my daughter is the guarantee that she will love you."

At this Caleb took down his hands and showed his tear-stained face in yet more pitiable plight than before. But into its disorder had flashed a ray of hope and happiness and exaltation so supreme as almost to beautify its homely outlines. It was the soul of an angel looking through the eyes of an animal.

"Do you really think so, Mrs. Clanricarde?" he said, clasping his hands as in prayer. "If you thought I could make her happy, and get out so much as a sparrow's meal of love from her, I would let her walk over my body if she'd a mind. I would lie down and die at her feet."

"What a drivelling idiot!" thought Mrs. Clanricarde, contemptuously.

Nothing in her nature answered to this fervid enthusiasm. Had Caleb made a business-like bargain with her, offering his money as an equivalent for Estelle's beauty, she would have discussed the terms on the basis of their needs as coolly as she would have bargained for a carriage-horse or a wheelbarrow.

"What a drivelling idiot!" she thought.

"Trust me, my dear, she said aloud. "I pledge you my word as a woman who knows her own sex, and her daughter best of all, Estelle will love you as much as you can desire. It will be your own fault if she does not. And I think we are sure of your part."

"God bless you for these comforting words!" said Caleb, now carried away from his former moorings as completely as a skiff in a tidal wave. "If she will have me she shall never have cause to repent it, so help me God in heaven!"

"Thank you, my son," said Mrs. Clanricarde. With again an outburst of fine impulsiveness she kissed the poor omad'haun on his cheek, and slightly shuddered as she did so. Then hastily rising from the seat where they had placed themselves—that seat under the shade of the spreading cedar where Estelle so often sat and dreamed of Charlie and their unlucky love—she said, with well-acted emotion, "Stay where you are, dear boy, and Estelle shall come to you."

With this she swept away, and Caleb was left to his own reflections.

Was it all true? Would she indeed be now brought to love him as her mother promised? After long years of patient waiting, of loving, serving and faithful apprenticeship, would she some day come to him, and of her own free-will hold out her hand to him, give him her sweet lips to kiss as one who had the right, offer him the treasures of her love, and say to him, "I love you?" Could it be true? How loyally he would shape his life to earn this great reward! She should be his queen, not his wife; and to her alone should belong the crown of sovereignty and the sceptre of dominion.

So he dreamed and thought, wrapt in his love like that sleeping babe in his robe of fire, while Mrs. Clanricarde in the drawing-room undertook the subjugation of her daughter, and drew the cords of her maternal authority to the utmost they would bear.

Her task was harder than she had anticipated. Fortified by her love for the one, which gave increased poignancy of disgust for the other, Estelle rebelled and refused, till her mother's patience—of what was in the beginning more diplomatic hardness than real wrath—gave way, and violent words were spoken which terrified the girl to hear, while they lashed to increased fury by their very echo the mother who had said them. Dark threats of public disgrace and eternal separation; of life-long banishment from home and country, and consignment to those French relations who would know how to treat an undutiful daughter as she deserved, passionate reminders of the curse lying on the head of a discarded child, like a crown of thorns ever pressing into the flesh, like a shadow on the path blotting out all sunshine; a sudden return to the pathos of appeal; the picture of father and mother turned into the streets to starve, reduced to beggary which the sacrifice of her own impossible fancy could avert—all that could most terrify a young girl's imagination and touch a daughter's heart, Mrs. Clanricarde poured forth into Estelle's ears like a boiling flood of mingled blood and tears—a fiery cloud of mingled wrath and sorrow.

For some time it was all in vain. Estelle held the image of her love before her eyes, and clung to the pedestal whereon she stood. Then at last, like something that gives way with a sudden snap, she, as Caleb had done before her, threw down her arms, and yielded herself prisoner to the force she could no longer resist.

"I will do as you wish, mother," she said, abruptly, standing stiff and rigid as if made of marble. "I will go out to Mr. Stagg."

"And God will bless you!" said Mrs. Clanricarde, putting her arms round the slender form that felt as if stricken to stone. "God will bless you as your mother does," she repeated, trying to draw down the averted head so that she might kiss that clay-cold face.

But Estelle tore herself away.

"Don't!" she said, harshly; "I cannot bear that, mother! and leave God's name out of a sacrilege and a sin."

"As you will, my poor dear darling!" said her mother, with a sigh admirably executed, drooping her own head with tender resignation.

So long as she had the main thing secure she cared little for the accessories, and whether Estelle counted her self-sacrifice as virtue or as sin made no change in her mother's mind.

Then Estelle, her face as pale as the face of a corpse, and the feeling of living death in her soul, went slowly over the lawn to the seat under that now desecrated cedar where Caleb Stagg sat dreaming of the time when he should call her his wife and make her his queen.

CHAPTER XI.

ON THE OTHER SIDE.

"My mother tells me you want to speak to me, Mr. Stagg," said Estelle, as she came up to where Caleb sat.

Like a sleeper suddenly awakened from a dream of treasure to the knowledge of loss, her dead white face and stiffened figure, the coldness of her voice, and the way in which she stood—her head turned away and her eyes looking into space—all brought Caleb back from hope to fact, from dream to reality, and made him conscious of his true position. He saw it all—as he had seen it before he had suffered himself to be flattered into folly by Mrs. Clanricarde's false words.

As she stood there, so sad and cold and lovely and reluctant—her natural shyness hardened to disdain, and dread of what was to come turning her ordinary fear to wound into the very cruelty of self-defence—a new spirit suddenly seemed to possess Caleb. His painful nervousness passed, his bashful awkwardness disappeared. In his very love for her—his profound pity and perplexity—he forgot himself, and the consciousness of his personal short-comings ceased to trouble him.

"Nay, never look like that, Miss Clanricarde. You must decide the matter for yourself," he said, gently. "I doubt you know what it all means."

Estelle was silent.

"Mrs. Clanricarde has told me that you are willing to marry me," he continued, his eyes fixed with grave tenderness on the girl's pallid face.

Estelle shivered through all her body, and her red, full lips drew themselves into a close line, like one who prevents a cry of pain.

"I understand it all," then said Caleb, still watching her. "Your affairs are in but a poor way, from all I hear, and not likely to get better. Father, he has more money than he can count or knows what to do with, and, as his only child, I shall have it all when he and mother go. I should have most of it now if I were to marry, and Mrs. Clanricarde thinks it would be a good thing for the family to get you well settled for gear. And I'm the only big purse holder hereaway. So she wants me for you, and you are not willing. That's just the long and short of it all."

He spoke in a quiet, firm, level tone, very unlike his usual interrupted manner, which left on his hearer the impression of physical writhing.

"How can I be willing when I do not love you?" said Estelle, hastily. "What girl wants to marry a man she does not love?"

"And you do not love me, Miss Clanricarde—and never could?" asked Caleb. "It is idle to ask if you love me now," he added, with the profoundest sadness in his voice. "God help me! how could you? But do you think that after years and years of kindness from me—of worship and devotion, and treating you as a queen, and never asking you for naught, you would not give of your own free-will—do you think that years after now you could come to have some kind of patience with me—some little kindness for me?"

Even Estelle was touched by the humility and unselfishness of her ungainly lover. Great as was her peril—and Charlie's—she could not be so inhuman as not to recognize the intrinsic goodness of her assigned executioner, who handled the knife so delicately, and was so gentle and tender.

"I should respect you, Mr. Stagg, and I respect you know," she answered, in a low voice, "but I could never love you—never! never! never!" she repeated, with sudden passion. "How could I?" she added, her eyebrows arched, and her under lip, which "a bee had newly stung," just a line thrust forward.

"Nay, indeed, how could you, Miss Clanricarde?" sighed Caleb. "I'm not of the kind for a dainty lady like you to love. I know it only too well, Miss Clanricarde; and small blame to you, I say."

"It is not that," said soft-hearted Estelle, shamed to compassion of a kind by this complete self-surrender. "Many girls would love you, Mr. Stagg, so kind and good as you are; many would, I am sure of that."

"But not you, Miss Clanricarde?"

"How can I?" she replied, with the desperate calmness of a gambler throwing his last chance. "I love Mr. Osborne, and only him, and I could never care for any other man in the world. How could I say that I should ever love you?—or any one, indeed?" she added.

"Ay! is it so?" said Caleb, with a little start. "I had heard there was a something between you and Mr. Osborne, but I didn't know it had gone that length."

"We have been engaged since we were boy and girl," said Estelle, "and I will never desert him. I will wait for him all my life. If I cannot marry him I will never marry any one else, and if I were dragged into the church I would say 'No' before the altar."

"And your mother, Mrs. Clanricarde, knows this?" he asked.

"Yes," said Estelle.

"Then how could she offer me to marry you, and say that you would consent?" asked Caleb again, with the honest clown's amaze at refined double-dealing.

"She spoke as she wished," said Mrs. Clanricarde's daughter, with the finest edge of scorn in her flexible voice. "My father has lost a quantity of money lately—all our fortune, indeed. Charlie is poor, and you are rich, and that is the whole story. You know that yourself. The thing is plain and simple enough."

"Yes, that is just as I put it," said Caleb, as quietly as if he were speaking of the most indifferent matter possible, and not of a thing which went with his very life and touched the innermost recesses of his being. But he was anxious to spare her both pain and embarrassment. "And that brings us round to our starting-point, Miss Clanricarde," he went on to say, after a moment's pause. "What is to be done for you, if you will not take me for my money's sake? You are just where you were."

"They must go into a smaller house, and I must go out as a governess or something till Charlie can afford to marry," said Estelle, bravely. "There are worse things in the world than either work or poverty," she added.

"Ay, that are there," said Caleb, a little dreamily. "An unloved man is worse."

"Yes, a great deal," she replied, quite simply—to repent of her candor when she saw those poor round fishy eyes grow red with sudden tears.

"If I could help you in your strait I would, Miss Clanricarde," then said Caleb, turning away from the thoughts of his own sorrow to lose himself in her difficulties. "But I have no means of my own. Father, he's a tight-hander, and does not make me so much as an allowance. He gives me all I want, and pays all I buy without a word, that I will say for him; but he never lets me have more than a couple of pounds in my pocket, and won't, he says, till I bring home a wife. And then all will be mine, and he'll keep back only what'll do for him and mother. So that, you see, Miss Clanricarde, I can do nothing out of myself. I'm like the Irish boggle," he added, simply, and yet with a little dash of bitterness in his voice, "that leprechaun who went with the estate."

A Toast to the Queen.

The following is a verbatim report of a speech in giving a toast of "The Queen" at a recent agricultural show dinner in Scotland. The Chairman said:

"Noo, gentlemen, will ye a' fill your glasses, for I'm aboot to bring forward 'The Queen.' (Applause) Oor Queen, gentlemen, is really a wonderfu' woman, if I may say it; she's ane o' the guid auld sort, nae whigmaleeries or laiderals aboot her, but a douce daecent body. She's respectable beyond a doot. She has brocht up her grand family o' weelfaur'd lads and lassies—her auldest son being a credit to ony mither—and the're a' weel married. Ae daughter is nae less than married to the Duke o' Argyll's son and heir. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, ye'll maybe no believe it, but I ance saw the Queen. (Sensation.) I did It was when I took my auld brown coo the Perth show. I remember her weel - such a color, such hair! (Interruption and cries of "Is it the coo or the Queen ye are proposing?") The Queen, gentlemen. I beg your pardon, but I was talking aboot the coo. However, as tae the Queen, somebody pointed her oot tae me at Perth station, and there she was, smart and tidy like, and says I tae myself: Gin my auld woman at hame slips awa' ye needna remain a widow anither hour langer.' (Cheers.) Noo, gentlemen, the whusky's guid, the nicht is lang, the weather is wet and the roads is saft and will harm naebody that comes to grief. So aff wi ye's; drink tae the bottom. 'The Queen!'" A Monkey With a Peculiar Tale.

A murder was recently committed near Lucknow. It was detected, it is said, by a monkey. It appears that a juggler, with his wife, a goat and two monkeys, were attacked by two Moplahs, who killed all except the male monkey, which escaped, and buried the bodies in the jungle. The male monkey took its station upon a big tree, watched everything, and when a constable passed by the animal made after him, laid hold of the man's leg and dragged him to the place where the bodies were buried. The bodies were exhumed, after which the monkey showed the way to a hut which the murderers had entered. Not finding them the animal took the constable in another direction, and suddenly ran at full speed and seized a Moplah, who was going to bathe near a tank, by the neck, and waited till the constable arrived. This led to the detection of the murderers. —London Court Journal.

Husband vs. Baby.

Wife (evening)—"My dear, don't think of going out to-night. Remember what a cold you have and how deadly the night air is. Stay here close to the fire, and I will send the girl for that medicine for you. You must not go yourself. There, that's right. Now just toast yourself and drink this hot ginger tea. As soon as the water is ready I'll bring it in so you can soak your feet. Then wrap yourself in my fur circular while going to your room. The least draught may be your death."

Same Wife (time midnight, to husband in a copious perspiration)—"Husband! Husband! Jump up quick and run for the doctor. Baby has coughed twice."

Matrimony in Chicago.

A good many Chicago people are getting married nowadays. Among the happy couples who procured licenses last Wednesday may be mentioned Michael Wawzyniak and Anna Cichanska, Ignatius Clybowski and Annie Wyschenewska, and Jane Strzyzynska and Antonia Oksinska. All these names are regular tooth-pullers, but marriage will wipe out half of them. Marriage is not a failure.—Chicago News.

A Plausible Theory.

Mrs. De Sweet—"I can't understand why so many cultured men are willing to leave all the happiness of home, all the blessings of civilization, and spend a lifetime in explorations in such countries as Africa."

Colonel Warmheart (gallantly)—"All men, madam, are not blessed with such wives as Mr. De Sweet."

"My wife is a perfect pattern of order and tidiness!" a gentleman once remarked to a group of his friends. "If I were to get up at midnight I should find in the dark every article of my linen." After this effort he felt for his pocket handkerchief and drew forth instead—a baby's shirt.

The Little Ones.

The little ones are pests, we sigh
And lots of trouble make us;
Ere golden morning opes her eye
They from our slumbers wake us.

Nay, oft ere half the night is o'er,
They start us from our dreaming,
And we must rise and walk the floor
Until they cease their screaming.

Perhaps our rashness we deplore
Indulge in wishing, maybe,
We had remained a bachelor
While singing "Sleep, my baby."

We wonder why we took a wife,
While wrath within us nursed is,
And think of all the ills of life
A squaling babe the worst is.

But when grim death is hovering nigh (Far distant may that day be!)
"Take all we own, O, Lord!" we cry,
"But spare to us the baby."

A Funny World.

This world is very funny,
For no matter how much money
Man is earning he will spend it, and be hard up all the time;
To his utmost he is straining
To catch up, without attaining,
Till he makes his life a burden when it should be bliss sublime.

He who earns a thousand merely
Thinks two thousand yearly
Would be just the figure to make happiness complete.
But his income when it doubles
Only multiplies his troubles,
For his outgo then increasing makes his both ends worse to meet.

It is run in debt and borrow,
Flush to-day and broke to-morrow,
Financeering every way to postpone the day of doom;
Spending money ere he makes it,
And then wondering what takes it,
Till he, giving up the riddle, looks for rest within the tomb.

Oh, this world is very funny
To the average man whose money
Doesn't quite pay for the dancing that he does before he should.
And he kills himself by trying
Just a little higher flying
Than is suited to his pocket and his own eternal good.

AN EXPENSIVE LUXURY.

What it Costs to Raise an Ordinary Boy to Man's Estate.

"My father never did anything for me," recently remarked a young man who a few weeks ago finished his school life and is now seeking a good business opening. Judging by the words and the complaining tone in which they were uttered, the member of the firm who heard them is prone to the belief that the young man's idea of "doing something" is an outright gift of $1,000 in a lump, or the purchase of a partnership in an established concern. The young man, to the knowledge of the writer, has never done one month's actual work for others in his entire life. His life has been passed in the pleasant pastimes of the home circle, in reading, hunting, fishing, ball-playing, yachting and other employments not particularly beneficial to others. He is a type of that class of boys whose parents are sufficiently well-to-do to keep servants to attend to the household drudgery, and whose fathers follow vocations in which no use can be made of the boy's spare time. Like most boys of his class, he looks upon his board and clothes for twenty years, together with his pony, jewellery, bicycle, etc., as matters of course. The writer, while the complaining remark was still ringing in his ear, had the curiosity to make a conservative compilation of what it costs to raise an ordinary boy for the first twenty years of his life, and here it is: $100 per year for the first five years, $500; $150 per year for the second five years, $750; $200 per year for the third five years, $1,000; $300 per year for the next three years $900; $500 per year for the next two years, $1,000. Total, $4,150. This is a moderate estimate of the financial balance against the boy who complains that his father has never done anything for him.—Exchange.

Indicted for Selling His Soul.

The following curious indictment for making an impious bargain with an evil spirit is copied from the new volume of "Middlesex County Records," edited by John Cordy Jeafferson:

"20 April, 19 Charles I.—True Bill that at St. Giles Without Tripplegate, co. Midd., on the said day, Thomas Browne, late of said parish, yeoman, by a certain writing, dated on the said day of the said year, wickedly, diabolically, and feloniously made an agreement with an evil and impious spirit, that he, the said Thomas Browne, would within ten days after the death of him, Thomas Browne, give his soul to the said evil and impious spirit, to the intention (ad intencionem—in consideration) that the said evil and impious spirit yearly, at the Feasts of Pentecost and the Purification of the Blessed Virgin Mary, should pay, or cause to be paid to the same Thomas Browne the sum of £1,000 of current English money on each of the said feasts for and during the term of the natural life of the said Thomas Browne and to the intention (ad intencionem—in consideration) that the said evil and impious spirit should defend the same Thomas from all perils of body and goods for and during the full term of 41 years, and that the same Thomas should have and marry a woman who should be pleasing to the same Thomas, and that the same Thomas should have and enjoy all health, riches and worldly pleasures for and during the natural life of the same Thomas. And for the performance thereof the same Thomas then and there, impiously and blasphemously as an impious apostate, promised and vowed to renounce the Lord and Saviour Christ, against the Catholic Christian faith, and to the grave scandal of the Christian religion and of all pious Christians, and to the great displeasure of God Almighty, and to the evil and pernicious example of all others in a case of this kind failing in duty (omnium aliorum hujusmodi casu delinquent em) and against the peace of the said Lord, now King, his crown and dignity, and also against the form of the statute for a case of this kind published and provided. Putting himself 'not guilty' on the contrary. Thomas Browne was found 'not guilty' by a jury who did not retract.—G. D. R., 19 Charles I."

REMARKABLE SLEEP.

A Woman in a Trance for Over Thirty-Five Days.

NO SOLID FOOD FOR EIGHTEEN MONTHS.

Mrs. Althouse, of Attica, N. Y., has awakened from her trance, which lasted a few hours over 35 days. She is excessively weak.

For a year and a half she has partaken of no solid food, and has remained in a series of trances throughout that period. The other day, a futile effort was made to arouse the sleeper. Dr. Retel sent a strong current from a galvanic battery through her frame, threw cold water on her face, and resorted to every means of which he could think to awaken her. The only result was that a slight glow was noticed on the body, and the cold, clammy feeling disappeared. Her head turned almost imperceptibly but there was no awakening. The electric current was turned on until it was strong enough to raise the dead, but that was all the good it did.

To a reporter the other day her sister said: "Emma's first sleep was in August, 1887, and she hasn't been off that bed since, nor has she taken any solid food."

"Just before that she was attacked with dysentery, and this was followed by inflammation of the stomach. When these were relieved she fell asleep, generally sleeping for three days and then awakening for a day and a night. Then she would gradually re-enter the trance state and remain in it for another three days.

"During her conscious moments she partook of nourishment in the shape of milk, which was fed to her by the spoonful, and the quantity given in that way seldom exceeded half a gill."

The trance periods increased in duration and lasted seven and ten days frequently. Her sisters judge that she knows what is going on while in them, and cite instances to prove that this knowledge is not limited to local events by any means.

A local Spiritualist believes that she is a misdirected medium, and that her spirit travels all over the country during the trances. He bases his opinion on what the sisters say.

Her grandfather died last summer while she was in a trance. When she awakened Dr. Huber, who was then attending her, inquired:

"What did you see or hear while you were asleep?"

Her lips moved, but no audible sound could be heard. She seemed too weak to talk.

"How is grandpa?" she finally whispered.

"He is worse," said the doctor.

"No; he is dead," she whispered; "I knew he is dead." She looked surprised as she said this. Miss Toms says that the death was never mentioned or alluded to in the sick room. Similar instances are vouched for by the family.

"What was her longest sleep?" I asked.

"It began on March 11th, 1888," was the reply, "and lasted thirty-five days, just as this one has now. She was awake for eight days before this sleep, and partook of more nourishment during that time than she had in the whole preceding time of her illness."

When she awakened that time it was only after persistent efforts on the part of the doctor, and when she opened her eyes she whispered to the doctor: "For heaven's sake don't let me go to sleep again or I shall never wake up." She then could not see with her eyes open nor could she distinguish anything, but these senses soon returned to her.

When coming out of a trance the symptoms exhibited are bleeding at the nose, high temperature, strong pulse and mutterings. She stays awake for a while and then takes a short nap, from which she easily awakens, feeling much refreshed.

On occasions, the family say, Mrs. Althouse has predicted the duration of her trances. She has usually slept for the periods indicated.

Moody and Sankey's Angels.

"An incident which I can never forget happened when we were singing in London," said Mr. W. B. Thomas, the first basso of the Fisk Jubilee Singers, last Saturday. "It was at the time Mr. Moody was preaching there, and he asked us to come and sing for him. According to instruction we were to enter at the rear door of the tabernacle, climb the back stairs and occupy a rear gallery, where we would not be seen by the congregation. There was an immense audience, over 7,000 persons being present. Mr. Moody preached his sermon, and at the close said to the people: "We will now bow our heads a few moments in silent prayer."

"That was our time. We softly sang, 'Steal Away to Jesus,' and everybody except Mr. Moody was astonished. They looked at the choir, but the choir was as much surprised as themselves. They could see no one on the platform but Mr. and Mrs. Sankey, and they were not singing. No words can describe the effect it had on them, many actually believing it was the singing of angels. We had sung in France, Germany, Austria and in Scotland, and before seven of the crowned heads of Europe, but had never created such a sensation as we did then, and," concluded Mr. Thomas, good humoredly, "we have never been taken for angels since."—Detroit Free Press.

A Christian Scientist's Advice.

Miss Whitlock, a Christian scientist of Fredericton, N. B., attended a lady who had a sore on her leg and persuaded her not to send for a doctor, as the matter was not serious. The lady has had her leg amputated, but it is feared the remedy was applied too late to save her life.

WAS ST. PAUL MARRIED?

Female Debaters Wrestle with the Unique Topic in Victoria, B.C.—Remarkable Sequel to the Inquiry.

(Victoria Correspondence Vancouver Courier.)

Towards the close of last week Victoria—or at least that portion of Victoria that goes to church—has enjoyed the delightful sensation of a full-fledged church scandal, smothered, or very nearly so, by the local papers, "out of consideration," etc. On Tuesday evening the energetic ladies of the Pandora Street Methodist Church filled the school-room to overflowing by announcing a debate, with three well-known ladies of the church on either side, upon the question, "Was St. Paul a Married Man?" The subject was unique and the audience expected the argument to be ditto and were in no way disappointed. Cold Biblical facts, pro and con., were interspersed with humorous anecdotes and witticisms, useful in the debate, but considered by some to be decidedly irreverent and casting a slur upon the sanctity surrounding the character of the greatest apostle of the Christian Church. The debate was reported in extenso by the city papers, and proved abundant food for conversation for the remainder of the week. Sunday following the discussion of St. Paul's domestic relations was the occasion of the anniversary of the Sunday school, and Rev. P. McF. Macleod, pastor of St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church, had promised to occupy the pulpit. The debate, however, had met with his strongest disapproval, and two days before he was to have preached he despatched the Rev. Mr. Starr, the shepherd of the Methodist flock, an "awful letter," censuring pastor and people for allowing the discussion, and making, he averred, the church the scene of a debate, some of the arguments adduced in which would have disgraced a brothel. The letter was a lengthy one and was couched in language—to borrow a chestnutty expression—that "gave forth no uncertain sound." It must have caused the ears of the reverend recipient to tingle a little, no matter how secure he felt in the right of the position he and his church had taken. The document was shown to but few. One who saw it was, however, the husband of one of the fair debaters, or debatees whichever it is; and his choler rose instanter. He demanded an immediate explanation of Rev. Mr. Macleod, and it is stated that his wife received in reply a letter from the pastor of St. Andrew's informing her that the only one which the letter to Mr. Starr had intended to censure was that gentleman's wife. The Presbyterian clergyman's opinion of herself, of course, reached Mrs. Starr's ears, and, not strange to say, she failed to appreciate it. She is of the opinion, and so are some others, that the trouble and strong words used are the outcome of personal jealousy, which Mrs. Macleod is said to entertain for Mrs. Starr's popularity. Mr. Macleod and Mr. Starr are willing to let the matter drop in order to avoid a scandal, but both are firm in supporting the positions they have taken. The clergy of the Episcopal Church supported Rev. Mr. Macleod from their pulpits on Sunday, which some people, of course, disapproved, and the whole matter is gradually cooling, although the two churches henceforth "will never speak as they pass by."

The Verdict of the World.

The man who conducts his business on the theory that it doesn't pay, and he can't afford, to advertise, sets up his judgment in opposition to that of all the best business men in the world. With a few years' experience in conducting a small business on a few thousand dollars of capital, he assumes to know more than thousands of men whose hourly transactions aggregate more than his do in a year, and who have made their millions by pursuing a course that he says doesn't pay. If advertising doesn't pay, why is it that the most successful merchants in every town, large and small, are the heaviest advertisers? If advertising doesn't pay, who does the most business? If it doesn't pay to advertise, why do the heaviest business firms in the world spend millions of dollars in that way? Is it because they want to donate those millions of dollars to the newspaper and magazine publishers, or because they don't know as much about business as the six-for-a-dollar "storekeeper" in a country town, who says money spent in advertising is thrown away, or donated to the man to whom it is paid? Such talk is simply ridiculous, and it requires more than the average patience to discuss the proposition of whether advertising pays or not with that kind of a man. His complacent self-conceit in assuming that he knows more than the entire business world is laughable, and reminds us of the man who proved that the world doesn't revolve by placing a pumpkin on a stump and watching it all night.—Burlington Republican.

GREW WEALTHY WITHOUT EFFORT.

The Remarkable Luck of Mr. Valancey Fuller's Late Partner.

When the late Lieut.-Gov. McDonald reached Escanaba he was still a laborer, although he had the confidence of railroad contractors, and they made him superintendent of some railway construction. Little by little he had accumulated means—perhaps $1,000—and time came for an investment. He paid $750 for a tract of land near Escanaba. There were no expectations built on the purchase further than that it was a safe place in which to keep his money. But gradually the mining investigations spread, and one day an expert came to him with an offer of $100,000 for the $750 tract of land. One of the best mineral veins of the Upper Peninsula had been discovered running across the land. McDonald finally declined the offer. Then $200,000 was offered. Still he shook his head. Then $300,000; still "no;" $400,000. "I think I'll run that myself," said he. He declined $500,000 for his land. He was a rich man. It had dropped into his hands.—Detroit Special to Chicago Herald.

Sir John Lawes on Fertility, Wheat, etc.

A newspaper reporter has been interviewing this noted agriculturist, and we find one of the most important experiments made at Rothamstead has been growing wheat continuously on one section for forty-five years—in one case without manure. The average of the first recorded eighteen years gave 14½ bushels per acre, and last year the same quantity was produced, showing that in the soil there is a large reserve amount of fertility. "Of course," continued Sir John, "you will know that this is a low average, for in the same field with some forms of manure we have had nearly thirty-five bushels per acre. Still, this low average is greater than that of America or India, and equal to that of all the world. So that our English soil can produce wheat as well as any other, even if unmanured."

"Then our allowing wheat to be grown by others for us is not because the soil is exhausted?"

"Not at all. It is merely a question of price. Wheat can be grown as well as ever, but not profitably under present rates."

"In case of war would it be possible to grow all the corn we need?"

"Yes, if the first year could be got over. All would depend upon that. Given the supply of seed, and we could grow all the corn needed in this country. But the feeding for that first year would determine the whole matter, and I do not see how it could be done, unless we can defend our commerce."

"Here," he continued, "I wish to show you a most important experiment. Five years ago we left the upper end of this wheat field uncropped, allowing the corn to fall when ripe. In three years there was scarcely a single ear of corn left; those which I could find were short in the stalk, and with perhaps a single grain. Now there is not one. This shows that food products are almost entirely artificial, and that in a few years the land would be a perfect wilderness if uncultivated. But I myself was surprised at the rapidity with which the wheat disappeared."

"How do you explain this?"

"The weeds were stronger and killed out the artificial grain. Weeds are hardy, and it is really 'the survival of the fittest,' or the hardiest. The same thing I can show you in the turnip field, where the unmanured plot is almost barren, the plants having scarcely in any case formed a bulb. It is the starch we want as food. Cultivation and fertilization give that starch."

"How have you found the crops this year, Sir John?"

"Grass and roots very heavy indeed, but grain bad. Not so serious as 1879, but still below the average. Here, for instance," picking up a bundle of wheat, "I always test by holding the straw midway. If the ears weigh it down I know all is right. If not, as in the case now, it is poor. I do not know yet how much the yield will go below the average, but it is seriously so."

"Then I suppose all-round farmers will not suffer greatly—that is, taking one crop with the other?"

"Stock farmers will be better off, for beef is rising, and they have abundance of food, but wheat farmers must suffer."

"I believe you have written against the system of silage. Is that so?"

"Yes. I do not believe in making silage for its own sake. In a bad year like the present, when hay could scarcely be made, the system may be employed, but not when the crops can be gathered in a good condition. The process destroys the finest qualities of the food and cannot make poor stuff into good food."

Not Beyond Hope.

"Every Sunday," replied the young man addressed. "I am an usher."

"There is hope even for you, my young friend," said the solemn-looking man, with deep feeling, as he handed him a tract.

An annual "mother's dinner" was held at Dorking last night. An interesting incident was the presentation by Mrs. Cubitt, wife of Mr. Cubitt, M.P., to Minnie Matilda Mirrell, aged 15, of an illuminated address and £5 awarded to her by the Society for the Protection of Life from Fire. She was a servant at the house of Mr. Inglis in High street, which a short time ago was burnt out. There were three children in the bed-room. She first rescued one from the first floor, then rushing up again she took the others, one under each arm, brought them down through the blinding smoke and heat, dropping one on the stairs, but afterwards groping up and recovering it. Finally she lowered the two children from the front window to the people in the street. The girl received an enthusiastic reception.—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE JESUIT BILL.

The agitation now going on in the press and pulpit of Canada over the Jesuit Bill is one of very grave importance. Appearances seem to indicate that Canada in her march of empire has arrived at a pivotal point, where she hangs quivering in the balance. Ninety years ago the Jesuits, or society of Jesus, were not; they had been suppressed by a Papal Bull. To-day our political parties tremble at their frown. Silently and secretly have they been growing, until a sufficient strength has been attained to bring our government to its feet. It is "expedient" that this bill should not be vetoed. Summed up the facts are these: A century ago the Jesuits of Quebec were possessed of certain property. A Papal Bull suppressed the order, and these estates were confiscated by the Crown. Some time afterward the society was received into favor again, and grew apace. It is now sufficently strong in our sister province to dictate the terms upon which any government shall receive power. Mr. Mercier has succumbed to its influence and restored to it value for the confiscated estates—$400,000. This is the bill which is now attracting so much adverse criticism. That the situation is extremely grave may be gathered from the following sentence from the Toronto Week: "No great prescience is required to foresee that the disallowance of the Jesuits' Estates Bill by the Dominion Government at the demand of the Protestant provinces, would involve a change in the constitutional doctrine equivalent to a revolution." Will this bill be vetoed? No. The society will receive its imaginary damages, because it has the "pull," and go on prospering and growing fat until both political parties are forced to unite on the matter and expel it from the Dominion, as it has been expelled from nearly every country in Europe, including Catholic France and Italy. To this end agitation is necessary, and this momentous incident, together with other minor matters, may serve to stimulate a hitherto somewhat dormant energy among Canadians, and spur them on to action. Protestants are not alone in their protest. Many loyal Catholics look upon the Jesuitical order with disfavor, and will render assistance. In the meantime, as The Week queryingly says, "The passing of this act can hardly fail to arouse thoughtful men all over the Dominion to ask anxiously, 'Where are we and whither are we drifting?'"

W. C. T. U.

As noticed last week, the W. C. T. U. county district meeting met in the Royal Templars' hall, Flesherton, on Wednesday. A large number of delegates were present. The meeting was enthusiastic and considerable important business was transacted. Following were the ladies who were present from outside points: Owen Sound. Mrs. A. Rogers, Desboro; Mrs S. Graham, Mrs. R. J. Doyle, Mrs. John Frost, Mrs. D W Morrison, Mrs J. G. Wilkinson, Mrs. Orton, Miss Meir, Miss Lizzie Stephens, Miss Katie G. Miller. Thornbury. Mrs. T. McKenny. Miss G. Hurlburt, Miss E. M. Even, Miss H. C. Carroll Flesherton Union was represented in a body. The evening meeting was held in the Presbyterian Church, which was well filled with an attentive audience. Rev. Mr. Shilton presided and introduced Mrs. A. Rogers, of Desboro, who delivered an earnest address, upon temperance work. Mrs. Rogers evidently believed that statistics were more convincing than personal statements, and she read a number of those which she had gleaned from newspapers. She dealt heavily with the British government and British people for styling themselves Christians and allowing the emissaries of Satan to fatten in their midst. Her address was listened to with much attention. The glee club sang several excellent selections, and Miss Christoe gave a solo in her usual attractive style. The delegates all returned home the following day.

Following is the address which was read to the lady delegates:

After edibles had been disposed of a lengthy program of much excellence was entered upon, Mr. Brodie being in the chair. Short speeches were delivered by Mr. H Meldrum and Dr. Scott of Maxwell. Kimberley Glee Club gave music that was roundly encored over and over again. Dialogues, recitations, etc., were well rendered. Music on two organs and violin, by Messrs. A Farewell.

There was a pleasant little gathering on Monday evening at Mr. J. Blackburn's residence, when members of the Presbyterian choir met to bid a farewell to the Misses Lizzie and Ella Gordon, who were severing their connection with old companions and friends, and departing for New York to take up their residence in the great metropolis. Mr. Blackburn gave a neat farewell address, and presented each of the young ladies, on behalf of the choir, with a very handsome dressing case. A very pleasant time was spent. Flesherton loses two of its best citizens, but the choir is much the heavier loser. Every citizen of Flesherton sends with these two amiable young ladies the heartiest wishes for their future happiness.

Returned.

Johnston McLoughry, brother of the assessor of Artemesia, arrived home on Friday 15 from Minneapolis, Minn., after having been confined in St. Anthony's hospital for nearly four months with typhoid fever. He had suffered two relapses of the fever, to which he would have succumbed if he had not been a man of very sound constitution. He has little the appearance of the strapping youth that left here last April. After a visit of some months with his friends he was then a man weighing over two hundred lbs., now reduced to almost a skeleton, but in fine spirits. He has very little relish for the proprietors of St. Anthony's hospital, but speaks very highly of the kindness shown him by Dr. Armstrong, one of Flesherton's boys.

Married.

On Tuesday evening last, Valentine's Day, between thirty and forty guests assembled at the residence of Mrs. H. Flesher, lot 111, 2nd east T. S. R., to witness the marriage of her daughter, Carrie B. Foster, to Thos. Wilscroft, Esq., of Holland Centre. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. Geo. Buggin. The bride was dressed in blue satin. Miss Maggie Foster was bridesmaid, and Mr. Wm. Moor, of Owen Sound, groomsman. All sat down to a bountiful repast and that being over the bridal party started for Owen Sound, accompanied to the station by most of the guests. The presents were numerous, costly and handsome, which fact might be accounted for by the fact that Carrie was a great favorite with all who knew her.

A large credit auction sale of some magnificent farm stock will take place at Flesherton station on Thursday, Feb. 28, the property of R. Oliver, Esq. This is a grand opportunity for any person desiring good stock. See large bills. Sale at 1 o'clock.

Flesherton Station.

Gleaned by our own Reporter.

The past week has been the week of the season so far as business has been concerned. Timber of all descriptions has just been rolling in. The delivery of grain is still below the mark. Oats are in good demand with prices somewhat advanced, at 31cts. per bushel.

Mr. Cook is making every effort in buying up cattle and hogs so as to be able to make another shipment next Tuesday. He purchased this week from Mr. Tucker some good animals to the amount of two hundred dollars.

Mr. W. who went to Listowell about three weeks ago on a visit for the purpose of raising his spirits, and to free himself of his melancholy frame of mind, has now returned and is quite convalescent, and speaks in glowing terms of how he enjoyed himself while away.

Robert Wright, son of Mr. W. Wright, and Dan McPherson son of Mr. McPherson, have left here for British Columbia.

Mr. A. Hannah is making every preparation to veneer his residence next spring, as he has had a large quantity of brick laid down so far. It looks as if he was a stayer.

A worthy citizen of our town had a wood bee last week and a regular hoe-down in the evening. Some of our old matrons seemed to enjoy themselves to the full of what the era tur?

Last Monday about noon a sleigh load of men who were taking out timber west of this place came to Mr. McGinnis's hotel, and for about two hours you would thought pandemonium was let loose, with their whooping, yelling and carousing through the house, to the inconvenience of the travelling public and private boarders. Their actions would remind you of the savages of the wilds of Tartary. I would advise friend McGinnis to give such characters as them a cold bevie and save the reputation of the house.

Friend Crossley is doing the business in the livery line seven days in the week. Bill Taylor is a stayer around the stables.

A tone sick swain from F. whose vision was slightly dimmed with tears, while gazing intently on a handkerchief gracefully waved from the rear coach of the N. Y. Express on Tuesday morning allowed his noble looking horse that liberty of action which resulted in an upset. The ladies who accompanied the youth think he must at the time have been ruminating on the advantages of unrestricted reciprocity.

LETTERS FROM THE FARM.

Specially Written for The Advance.

It is not material that you should know where our farm is situated. I will only tell you that it is called Burnham. It derived that name in the following manner: When father first set foot upon it there were ten acres of cleared land and all covered with a dense mass of bush. Since ... stumpology ... with strikingly keen pearl, thanks to proper cultivation.

Well, our family is not large now—not as large as it was at one time. Jack is in Dakota, Charlie is in the Northwest, and Martha is in love. I am the youngest brother. There are just four of ... and I, father and mother. I have ... M... [illegible] ... it and expressed to the ... and the straw ... I saw was ... Jimmy. I ... now. They had both been sitting in the rocking chair and I ... when I bounced in, they got scared and, jumped and knocked the rocking chair over and all three went sprawling over the ... Jimmy cracks! didn't I ... I didn't laugh when sis got hold of my ear. Did you ever see a girl mad? It's awful.

Things on the farm are quiet now. There is nothing for me to do but get up and split wood, feed the cattle, milk one cow, get breakfast, split more wood, go to school, come home, split wood, feed the cattle, milk one cow, split a little more wood, study lessons for next day, do a little literary work for The Advance, go to bed and split wood all night—in my dreams. I am resting this winter for next summer's work. I am going to learn how to plow in the spring, and I'll be, you know now I get along.

Say, isn't this beautiful winter weather. I always loved plenty of snow, and we have it now. Mr. Whittier knew all about the fun to be got out of a snow drift, and tells about it in his "Snow Bound."

> We on the south had witness thrown,
> And where the drift was deepest, made
> A tunnel walled and overlaid
> With dazzling crystal: we had read
> Of rare Aladdin's wondrous cave,
> And to our own his name we gave.

Perhaps you town people think it is a dull life living on a farm, but it ain't. There's just hogsheads of excitement. The other day when the family was away to Flesherton me and a neighbor boy decided to break in our two year old colt. We harnessed him in the old horse's harness and hitched him to a handsleigh. The harness was too big for him. He always was a very quiet colt, and you couldn't get him off a walk ordinarily, but that was because he wasn't broke in. We got on the handsleigh and yelled "git up," and shook the lines, and that there colt did just git up! He started off and fairly flew, an' the snow flew, and then Jim who was behind me he flew head over heels into a snow bank, and then the sleigh struck a stump and I soared about fifteen feet and struck head first in another drift. I waved my heels around like the arms of a windmill for about ten minutes before I got my head out, and there was Jim just crawling out too. The sleigh was scattered around in fragments and the harness lay in streaks all over the snow. Excitement! why, there was almost too much of it. I wasn't at school that day. It was Saturday.

I guess, though, this letter is pretty near long enough, and anyway I've got to go and split some wood.

Yours affectionately,

ZEKE BRADSHAW

CORRESPONDENCE.

Kimberley News.

From our own Correspondent.

The anniversary of the Kimberley Sabbath School came off on Wednesday evening last as advertised. The attendance was fairly good. The singing by the children was also good, under the leadership of Miss S. A. Thompson. If the children had been standing in front of the organ instead of the organ in front of the children the singing might have ... much better. The recitations and dialogues were very well rendered, under the management of Miss Burnett and Miss Abercrombie. The only difficulty was, they did not speak quite loud enough to be heard distinctly.

Speeches by Mr. Hall and Rev. Mr. Watts, were not of the best quality. Mr. Hall ... Mr. Watts ... and he said ... therefore it was no wonder Mr. Watts will not make a speech. We are sorry we are not in possession of the address. Proceeds, $10 50.

The people of the Methodist church here are going to build a shed this spring. They have about enough subscribed now to go ahead with the work. We wish them success in their undertaking as a shed is much needed.

Mr. Will Dunwoodie and Miss Mary Smith of Flesherton were the guests of Mrs. Aldous on Saturday and Sunday last.

Mrs. Hooper, who died here lately, was one of the brightest ... women. She was ... Presbyterian. For the last few months of her life she was ... of resolving. She resigned herself to whatever might come. In the midst of her pain and sickness she never murmured. About a week before she died she grew worse rapidly, and she said she could not hold up any longer. She did not wish to stay, for she had her peace made with God years ago, and she knew that she was going to be with Christ, which is far better, and on the morning of Jan. 24th she gently fell asleep.

The excitement over Mr. Nevins's wedding has abated to a certain extent, although we occasionally hear some idle body threatening a charivari. This part of the country is notorious for the effectual way in which the young lads carry out their chivaris, and undoubtedly Mr. Nevin would have had the honor of one, if it was not for the cold and stormy weather we have had of late. Considering everything we think he has come off safer than the most of people do while taking such an important step in life, notwithstanding the severe attack made upon him by some of the howling canine tribe, while passing through Priceville.

Mr. J. Tagart and A. McDannel have been working up at Proton station the most of this winter. Times there were rather slow and dull for them so they proposed to some of their companions the advisability of going out to the ... country to have a dance. The ... was received favorably by everybody, so according to the agreement a sleigh load of young folks started out on the Hillsgreen road and never stopped until they reached the Fairview farm, a distance of about eight miles. After going into the house and getting part of their garments off and their boots thawed out, then the music and dancing commenced.

EXTRAORDINARY MISTAKEN IDENTITY.

Grief Wasted Over the Corpse of a Mother's Double.

When James Waters, who lives at No. 2,033 Orkney street, returned from his work last night, he saw a stout, middle-aged woman sitting on the stoop whose face bore a deadly pallor. The woman told Mr. Waters that she was ill, and he asked her to rest herself inside. She accepted his invitation, and was escorted to a couch, upon which she reclined. Suddenly she jumped up, and saying that she must have fresh air, opened a door and went into the yard. She gave several gasps and dropped dead.

The body was taken into Mr. Waters' house and the neighbors were called in for the purpose of having the dead woman identified. One little girl glanced at the features and exclaimed: "That's Mrs. Dierolf." She brought her mother, who also said the body was that of Mrs. Rosanna Dierolf, of No. 928 Somerset street.

The report that Mrs. Dierolf had dropped dead spread from one end of little Orkney street to the other. It reached the ears of two of that woman's daughters, who hastened to the house. They were conducted to the room where the remains were. Amid sobs and violent outbursts of grief the young women said the body was that of their mother. One of the girls threw herself over the body and was with difficulty taken away.

Coroner's Messenger Matthews, who lives in the vicinity, was notified to remove the body to No. 928 Somerset street. The heart-broken daughters slowly followed the waggon to their home. Messenger Matthews jumped off his waggon and rang the door-bell. A woman answered the summons who bore a striking resemblance to the corpse. Matthews thought it was her sister. He said:

"The body of Mrs. Rosanna Dierolf is in that waggon. She died suddenly down the street. Where do you want it to be—"

"What!" shrieked the woman. "I am Mrs. Rosanna Dierolf. You don't mean me, surely?"

The messenger thought there must be a mistake somewhere. He saw the two girls half a block away, and he hurried towards them and asked if they were sure the body was that of their mother.

The two sobbed hysterically and nodded their heads affirmatively. When they came up to the house the front door was closed. One of them opened it with a key and called to members of the household, whom she informed of the death of Mrs. Dierolf. "Do I look like a dead woman?" came from the dining-room, in tones that betokened anger.

The voice was familiar. It was that of the girls' mother. Thither they went, and when they beheld their mother whom they had recognized as dead they cried for joy and asked forgiveness.

Messenger Matthews was a silent witness. "In all my experience handling the dead," he said, "I never saw anything the like of this." Turning to Mrs. Dierolf he said: "Madam, your children aren't to be blamed for thinking the dead woman was you. She's your double, she is."

The woman who was supposed to be Mrs. Dierolf was about 50 years old and weighed about 200 pounds. She wore a brown skirt, a blue polka dot body, a gray plaid shawl and a dark poke bonnet. Philadelphia Times.

KILLED BY A BURGLAR.

A Hotel Landlord at Swansea, Wales, Murdered by a Negro.

A London cable says: Mr. Kent, landlord of the Gloucester Hotel, at Swansea, was killed by a burglar Sunday morning. He retired with his wife late on Saturday night, after locking all the doors, including those of his bedroom. Early next morning the wife heard a match struck in the room and saw a negro lighting a candle. She awoke her husband and he grappled with the intruder, while his wife took a pistol from under the pillow. As it was too dark to take aim she lighted a candle. She then fired and the negro fell, wounded in the thigh. Cursing the woman, he crept under the bed, but as she was unlocking the door emerged and threw a mirror at her. It missed her, but extinguished the light and the negro escaped. When she re lighted the candle she discovered that her husband's throat was cut with a razor. Kent lived long enough to describe the murderer. An alarm was raised and about noon the negro was discovered at a dry dock badly wounded and covered with blood. He is a seaman named Sam Allan. He said his motive was robbery. He concealed himself in the room before the house was closed on Saturday night.

VICE-REGAL FASHIONS.

Costumes Worn by Lady Stanley and Her Friends at the Carnival Fancy Ball.

Writing on the fancy dress ball, given in Montreal, a correspondent says: Lady Stanley was dressed in a rich velvet dress of a lovely sage green, which shimmered as she walked along the beautifully lit ball-room. Pink brocade helped to relieve the eye. Her Ladyship's ornaments were diamonds of the first water. Lady Alice Stanley looked very handsome in a faultlessly made dress of black tulle, with a moire satin sash. His Excellency's daughter-in-law wore some fine diamonds in her hair, while her neck was circled with similar ornaments. The Hon. Mrs. Colville wore white tulle, with brocade body and sash, her arms being set off with bracelets of dead gold, studded with brilliants, which were also conspicuous in her hair.

Fortunate for the "Smiths."

A New Zealand paper is responsible for one of those stories which are almost too good to be true. The mutiny of the Bounty occurred in 1789, and the descendants of the mutineers are now living on Pitcairn Island and on Norfolk Island. One of the most noted of the ringleaders was John Adams, whose real name is said to have been Alexander Smith. A midshipman, who owed his rescue from drowning to Smith, was desirous of rewarding him properly, and placed £100 to his credit in a bank to await his call. The interest was to accumulate, and as the right Smith could never be found, principal and interest now amount to £96,000. This is a tolerably large nest-egg for three grandsons of the mutineer, one of whom is said to have established his title.

A CHICAGO TRAGEDY.

A Reporter Murders his Wife and then Suicides—A Friend's Strange Conduct.

A Chicago despatch says: W. T. Bradley yesterday shot his wife dead and then committed suicide at the Hotel Cortland. Both were employed by the Chicago Globe, the husband as a reporter and the wife as literary editor. This is the third tragedy of the kind that has taken place here within a week. After the bodies were taken to an undertakers, Frederick Mann, a linen importer, entered the hotel, and being told of the shooting was overcome with grief and raved around exclaiming, "It was a life thrown away!" and "Oh! the brute." He then started on a run for the undertaker's, where he threw himself upon the woman's body, kissing her hands and face, unmindful of the blood which stained her clothing and face. It was some minutes before he could be dragged away from the body. He then glared for a moment at Bradley's body, and, with an oath, said, "Oh, the thief, villain, brute, let me get at him!" Mann then made a rush at Bradley's body, and would doubtless have thrown it upon the floor had not the officers dragged him from the room. Mann stated that he had known Mrs. Bradley since childhood, and knew all about her troubles. He was very fond of her, and had repeatedly warned her against Bradley. He said Mrs. Bradley had decided to part from her husband and that was the direct cause of the shooting. While Bradley was in prison Mann escorted Mrs. Bradley to and from her night assignment. This made Bradley insanely jealous, and with Bradley's dissipated habits led to frequent quarrels and culminated in yesterday's tragedy. Mrs. Bradley was formerly connected with the stage.

RITUALISM ON TRIAL.

Great Excitement Over the Charges Against the Bishop of Lincoln—The Investigation Begins To-Morrow.

A special cablegram from London says: England is to have its own theological excitement next week, reflections of which will extend all over the English-speaking globe. Dr. King, the Bishop of Lincoln, is to appear at the ancient ecclesiastical palace of Lambeth, whose brown turrets face the Thames over against the Houses of Parliament, next Tuesday, to be tried by the Primate for ritualistic practices. It is understood that the Bishop will come in his cope and mitre, attended by the whole body of his canons, and will take the a priori objection that he has the right to be tried by a synod of bishops. If this plea is sustained there will be an adjournment until an episcopal convocation can be summoned.

The charges against Dr. King are six in number—the use of candles on the communion table, the mixing of water with the communion wine, having the "Agnus Dei" sung after the prayer of consecration, holding his hands in the shape of the cross while pronouncing the benediction, facing towards the east while breaking bread, and performing the rite of ablution, which means himself drinking out of the chalice. The action of the Church Association in insisting on the trial has created very bitter feeling among the more liberal clergy, and even the Tory papers denounce it as a regrettable relic of mediæval bigotry. No such trial of a bishop has occurred before since the Reformation.

THE AUSTRIAN THRONE.

The Late Tragedy Again Revived—The Succession.

A Berlin cable says: The National Zeitung says advices from St. Petersburg, which may be regarded as absolutely authentic, assert that Count Hoyes and all the domestics at the Meyerling chateau saw Baroness Vetsera, who had been shot, lying under the counterpane on Crown Prince Rudolph's bed, and the Crown Prince lying outside the bed clothes, and that they confirm the report of family disputes arising owing to the intimacy of the Crown Prince with the Baroness.

In discussing the Austrian succession, the general press expresses the opinion that Emperor Francis Joseph will recognize the validity of the provisions of the pragmatic sanction, that only in case of the total extinction of the male line shall the succession devolve upon a female. Vienna court advices assert that Emperor Francis Joseph avoids facing the succession difficulty. Archduke Francis, the presumptive Crown Prince, who is highly esteemed by the Emperor, suffers severely from epilepsy. He himself desires to live in quietness and obscurity. The Emperor detests the next brother, Archduke Otto, the scamp who so brutally treated his wife, Princess Marie, of Saxony, that he recently entreated her relatives to give her shelter and procure for her a separation.

A Jury of Women May Be Needed

A Pittsburg despatch says: A curious case, which may result in a request for a jury composed of women will come up in the Orphans' Court shortly. A Miss Mitchell claims the estate of Thomas Sheehan, late of this city. Sheehan had a daughter who was placed in a convent when a child, and who, it was afterwards reported, had died. Sheehan died some time ago, leaving an estate worth $50,000, and Miss Mitchell laid claim to it as his daughter. A number of other women put in claims, but all except Miss Mitchell were rejected as spurious claimants. She is identified by her mother through a birth-mark, and at the trial it is probable a jury of women will be demanded to decide the case. This is something which the old common law permitted in certain cases, but which is not known in the profession as a matter of practice for over two centuries.

Gertie Won't Do It Again.

A Halifax despatch says: Miss Gertie Smith, who eloped with Rev. Mr. Hutchinson some months ago, has been deserted by her whilom lover, and is now residing in England.

Seven white and four black convicts were disciplined at Newcastle, Del., on Saturday. Two Philadelphia burglars, "Broken nose George" and "Curley" Harris, stood one hour in the pillory and took twenty lashes each for their attempt to rob Hart & Brothers' safe in that city a few weeks ago. Three negroes, for petty burglaries, took the same punishment, and six other convicts five lashes each for petty larcenies. There was a large crowd present.

DOMINION PARLIAMENT.

Mr. Laurier presented a number of petitions from the Knights of Labor assemblies praying for various amendments to the law in the interest of the working classes.

Mr. Foster presented the report of the Auditor-General for the past fiscal year; also a preliminary abstract of the business of life insurance companies, and a return of Governor-General's warrants issued since the last sitting of Parliament.

Sir Adolphe Caron presented the annual report of the department of Militia and Defence.

Mr. Brown introduced a Bill to make further provision as to the prevention of cruelty to animals. He explained that the object of the Bill was to prevent those forms of cruelty to animals not already prohibited by law, such as trap-shooting of pigeons, cock and dog fighting, and other sports in which live animals are employed.

The Bill was read a first time.

Sir John Thompson introduced a Bill to amend the Electoral Franchise Act. This Bill was substantially the same as that of last session, which, for want of time at the disposal of the House, did not become law. The scheme proposed was, that immediately after the 1st of June, the revising officer, as directed by the present statute, shall proceed with his revision, and shall make supplementary lists of voters, which shall be sent to the Queen's printer and returned to the revising officer to be posted up for public inspection. On a fixed day objections will be heard and corrections, if necessary, made and inserted in the list by the Government printing officer. The list, as so corrected and printed, shall be final, and shall be struck off and distributed in the manner provided by the present Act. The list, as thus established, is to be final as to the qualification of the voter. The polling districts shall be subdivided from time to time so that they shall not exceed 250 voters instead of 300 as at present. Other changes were proposed with the view of simplifying and reducing the cost of revision.

The Bill was read a first time.

Sir John Thompson introduced a Bill relating to bills of exchange, cheques and promissory notes. The Bill was to a large extent declaratory of the common law and the usages of the mercantile community, and it was not proposed to bring it into force till the 1st of September next.

Mr. Taylor, for Mr. Kirkpatrick, introduced a Bill to permit foreign vessels to aid vessels wrecked or disabled in Canadian waters.

Mr. Patterson (Essex) introduced a Bill to admit United States vessels to wrecking, towing and coasting privileges in Canadian waters. He explained that the Bill made provision for American vessels enjoying the privileges enumerated in the title, so soon as the Government of the United States shall pass a law giving these title privileges to Canadian vessels.

Mr. Boyle introduced a Bill to prevent the practice of fraud by tree peddlers and commission men in the sale of nursery stock.

Messrs. Waldie and LaRiviere, members-elect for Halton and Provencher respectively, were introduced and took their seats.

Mr. Bowell, in answer to inquiries from Mr. Edgar, said that the electoral lists, as revised in 1886, had been prepared and had been furnished to certain parties in the case of bye elections for the House of Commons, and for elections under the Canada Temperance Act, and only in such cases.

Mr. Foster, in reply to an inquiry from Mr. Perry, as to whether or not the Government intended to place in the estimates a sum sufficient to build a subway connecting Prince Edward Island with the mainland, said the intention of the Government would be shown in the estimates shortly to be brought down.

Mr. Brown moved for a committee to inquire into the frauds practised on farmers and others. He thought a good work had been done by this committee last session, though organized very late in the session, and he believed there was room for further profitable investigation.

Mr. Armstrong said he thought there was no necessity for re-appointing this committee. It had fulfilled its mission and the expense of further inquiry would hardly be justified.

Mr. McMullen favored further inquiry by the committee and believed that it could yet render good service.

The motion was carried.

Mr. Costigan rose to refer to a statement in the annual report of the Inland Revenue Department which had been interpreted to mean that the consumption of liquors had increased in the country, and had been construed in some quarters to be an attack on the Canada Temperance Act. The statement in question was an error on the part of a clerk in the department and would be made right in a corrected issue of the report. The correct percentage of the consumption of liquors was about three-fourths of a gallon per head.

Messrs. Denison, Cockburn and others presented a number of petitions praying for changes in the law in the interest of the working classes.

Mr. Brown presented a petition from the Hamilton Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, praying that the Bill now before Parliament, having the objects of the society in view, may pass.

Mr. Haggart presented the annual report of the Post-office Department.

Mr. Foster presented the report of Mr. Simeon Jones, Commissioner to the Argentine Republic.

Mr. Cook introduced a Bill further to amend the Railway Act. He explained that the Bill proposed to require greater care on the part of railway companies in the matter of landing passengers and handling baggage.

Mr. Cook introduced a Bill to provide for the examination and licensing of all persons employed as stationary engineers, and all persons having charge of steam boilers and other devices under pressure.

Mr. Laurier intimated that to-morrow he would ask the Government for the usual explanation as to the changes that had taken place in the Cabinet during recess.

Mr. Landry introduced a Bill to amend the Act respecting interest. He explained that the Bill proposed to fix the amount of interest payable on all contracts at a certain rate which it would be usurious to exceed. As to what the limit should be, he wished to have the opinion of the House.

The Bill was read a first time.

Mr. Wallace introduced a Bill for the prevention and suppression of combinations formed in restraint of trade. The object of the Bill was to prevent any persons, corporations or companies from granting exclusive privileges to any persons, as well as from denying privileges to one person when granted to other persons under similar conditions. It is also proposed to prevent parties from combining to restrict the manufacture and production of articles of merchandise that are either produced in this country or are imported. Penalties by fine or imprisonment, or both, were provided for infraction of the Act. The Bill did not interfere with section 121 of the Revised Statutes respecting trades unions.

The Bill was read a first time.

Mr. Laurier moved for copies of all Orders-in-Council, etc., relating to the dismissal of the Hon. William Ross from the collectorship of Customs at the port of Halifax.

Sir John Macdonald, in reply to an inquiry of Mr. Laurier's as to the recent Cabinet changes, said that at the close of last session it was thought well that Sir Charles Tupper, Minister of Finance, should resume his position as Commissioner in London, and he therefore resigned his position, and Mr. Foster, Minister of Marine and Fisheries, was appointed in his stead, Mr. Charles H. Tupper taking the vacant portfolio of Marine. In the place of Mr. McLelan, late Postmaster-General, who was appointed Lieutenant-Governor of his native Province, Nova Scotia, Mr. Haggart, the member for Lanark, was appointed to the Post-office Department, and in place of the late lamented Mr. White, Minister of the Interior, Mr. Dewdney, member for East Assiniboia, was appointed.

Major-General Laurie, member-elect for Shelburne, N. S., was introduced and took his seat.

Mr. Edgar moved for copies of the resolutions passed at the conference held in 1887 at the city of Quebec of delegates from the several Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Manitoba. He said he understood that these resolutions had been forwarded to the Dominion Government, and regarded it of importance that the House should be placed in possession of them without delay.

The motion was carried.

The following Bills were introduced and read a first time:

Act to provide for a regular ferry between the city of Quebec and the town of Levis. Mr. Choquette.

Act to require the owners of elevators and hoists to guard against accidents. Mr. Madill.

Mr. Wood (Brockville) in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee on Standing Orders, moved that the time for receiving petitions for Private Bills be extended to the 22nd inst., and the time for presenting the same to the 28th inst. The motion was carried.

The following Bills were introduced and read a first time:

To incorporate the Algoma Railway & Coal Company—Mr. Shanly.

Respecting the Kootenay & Athabasca Railway Company—Mr. Mara.

To provide against frauds in supplying milk to cheese and butter factories—Mr. Burdett.

Mr. Davies inquired if it was the intention of the Government to treat the temporary offer made by the British plenipotentiaries to those of the United States at the time of the signing of the Fishery Treaty in Washington in November, 1888, the budget speech?

Mr. Foster said that was the intention, and known as the Modus Vivendi, as still in force, and to issue licenses as therein provided to American fishermen for the fishing season of 1889.

Mr. Tupper—That subject is now under consideration.

Mr. Foster laid on the table the estimates of the sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending 30th June, 1890.

Sir Richard Cartwright inquired if it was the intention of the Government to pursue the practice introduced last session, of proceeding forthwith with the consideration of the estimates before the delivery of He hoped there would be no objection to going into the estimates on Tuesday next.

Sir Richard Cartwright said he had no objection. The new practice was similar to that followed in England, and he had always approved of it.

Mr. Perry, in moving for a return of the number of lobster canneries round the coast of Prince Edward Island, complained that the fishing regulations in force there did not properly protect the lobster industry, and were not properly enforced by the inspectors.

Mr. Tupper said the regulations in question were experimental, and were only adopted for the season of last year. It was proposed to issue new regulations for the coming season.

A number of orders for papers were passed and the House adjourned at 4 05 o'clock.

Once in a Hundred Years.

The Magazine of American History points out the present winter had its counterpart a hundred years ago and also two hundred years ago. In 1789 the farmers on Long Island were ploughing their fields in January, and in 1688-9 the Baron La Hontan made a canoe expedition in Minnesota waters, from November to March, without detention by ice.

ONTARIO LEGISLATURE.

Several petitions were presented praying for the amendment of the Assessment, Municipal and School Acts.

The following Bills were introduced and read the first time:

Mr. McMahon—To facilitate the purchase of toll roads by municipalities.

Mr. Waters—To amend the Act respecting mortgages and the conveyance of personal property.

Mr. Monk asked whether it is the intention of the Government to afford to the city of Ottawa and the county of Carleton the advantages of the Torrens Land Transfer Act on the same terms as was afforded to the city of Toronto and the county of York when first introduced.

Mr. Mowat said it was impossible to make Ottawa and the vicinity of Carleton an exception to a rule obtaining all over the Province and Toronto had been made exceptional in the first instance because the Government desired to give the whole Province an example of the operations of the Act. In the last three years the fees received by the Master had been quite sufficient to pay all expenses, in fact more than sufficient. It was only during the first year before the Act was in good working order that there was any charge on the public treasury.

Mr. Clarke (Wellington) moved for an order of the House for a return showing the location of any Houses of Industry, Poor Houses, or similar institutions, for the care and maintenance of indigent persons, now established in any of the cities, towns and counties in the Province of Ontario, at the total or partial cost of any municipality. In speaking to the motion, he said the information asked for would be of great value to some of the municipalities who had under consideration the propriety of establishing these institutions. He hoped the return when it came down would completely satisfy other municipalities of the benefits to be derived from such institutions. There were more indigent persons at the present time in the Province than in any previous year, and the care of these people was a matter well worthy of the consideration of law givers. In regard to the amelioration of the condition of the blind, insane, etc., Ontario had done its duty, and was proud of her institutions. But little had been done on the co-operative plan for the maintenance of our indigent. The warm-hearted people of Waterloo were the first to move in the matter. The County of Norfolk followed the example, then Elgin, Wellington, Middlesex and York. He found that the law required that annual returns should be sent in from the Houses of Refuge, but no such returns had yet been made. He had, however, obtained figures privately from some of them. In Waterloo the annual cost per inmate of the House of Refuge was $51 87, Elgin $49 95, Wellington $59 53, Middlesex $58 85, York $57 93; or an average of $56 25. At the Provincial Institutions the cost per inmate per year was: Asylums, $135; hospitals, $229; Central Prison, $169; Reformatory, $198; Mercer, $211; jail, $65.90. He thought the Government might devise some plan to utilize the Houses of Industry throughout the country for the accommodation of the insane, instead of sending them to the jails. A Government inspection of these institutions would then, of course, be necessary. Some of the Houses of Refuge had inmates whose maintenance properly belonged to the Province, and he thought the Government might consider the advisability of extending some aid to them.

Mr. Meredith said that the House was indebted to his hon. friend for bringing up the matter. He was sorry, however, his hon. friend had indulged in one of the usual pessimistic utterances peculiar to gentlemen opposite. It was somewhat singular, however, that the poor-houses were established in what they called the banner counties. One thing they had to consider was that there was gradually springing up a class of professional poor, especially in the large cities. Where the test of actual work had been applied in Toronto this class had decreased. Care should be taken that they did not provide conditions under which the professional poor would be supported at the public expense. With regard to many of the insane in the poor-houses, they were not insane within the meaning of the Asylum Act. The Blind Institution, again, was only for those for whom there was hope of being benefitted by the treatment pursued there. He went on to refer to the evil of outside municipalities sending their poor and feeble to the large cities for support, and said some legislation should be devised to check this.

Mr. Hardy said that some years ago a law was passed making it compulsory upon counties to establish poor houses, but so much opposition to it was aroused that it was repealed. Public opinion was divided as to the advisability of erecting these poor houses. Whenever one had been established, and there had been a fair opportunity of its being worked, the general opinion was that it had done good in the public interest. If any plan could be devised, just falling short of making the establishment of these institutions compulsory, a good end would be served. A good many persons thought that by establishing these institutions a chronic class of paupers would be encouraged, or a number of men and women would be brought up to look at the poor houses as the ultimate aim of their life. He doubted that such a result would follow a system like our own.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton) brought down the following returns ordered by the House: Respecting the fees payable to Judge Lacourse, judge of the County Court of the county of Waterloo; also regarding the fees payable to Mr. W. A. McLean, local Master of the Supreme Court of Judicature for Ontario at Walkerton.

The report of the Minister of Education on the subject of technical education was also presented to the House.

Several petitions were presented praying for amendments to the municipal law in the direction of abolishing tax exemptions; from the city of Toronto, praying for an Act for the re-arrangement of the city debt; from the city of Hamilton, praying that the Assessment Act be amended so as to exempt $600 dwellings, and for the extension of the Factory Act to workshops and dwellings, also that the grants made to universities and colleges be transferred to the Public Schools.

The following Bills were introduced and read for the first time:

Mr. Drury—To confirm a conveyance made by the town of Barrie to the Queen.

Mr. Garson—Respecting the examination of engineers for stationary engines.

Mr. Kerns—Respecting the town of Oakville.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on Mr. Fraser's Bill respecting voters' lists. The Bill consolidates the law, and applies its provisions to voters within the meaning of the Manhood Suffrage Act.

Mr. Clancy called attention to the fact that the names of aliens had appeared on the lists, and they could not be scrutinized, the lists being final.

Mr. Fraser said the reason the lists were made final was because a scrutiny would involve enormous expense. If an alien took the oath and voted, the remedy would be to prosecute him for perjury.

When the clause relating to appeals to the County Judge to have names struck off the list came up Mr. Meredith drew attention to the apparent injustice in subpœnaing men to attend the court on the ground that they were not entitled to vote, and because they failed to attend through carelessness, although entitled to vote, their names were struck off.

Mr. Fraser said he could see no reason why a judge should strike a man's name off the list simply for non attendance. It was a question that required some consideration, because appeals might be made on frivolous grounds, and sometimes might be done to empower the judge to order the appellant, if it was shown that he appealed on frivolous grounds with the expectation that the voter would not attend and consequently be struck off, to pay the costs. He would give the question his consideration, and perhaps something might be done to do away with what might really become an undoubted evil.

The committee rose and reported the Bill, with certain verbal amendments.

In reply to Mr. Clancy, Mr. Fraser said the reports of the Factories Inspectors were in the hands of the printers.

The following Bills were introduced and read the first time:

Mr. Balfour—To amend the Ontario Election Act.

Mr. Bishop—To amend the Act respecting insurance companies.

Mr. Fraser, in moving the second reading of the Bill to amend the Ontario Factories Act, explained the principal alterations which it is proposed to make in the existing law. At present any place or premises which would be otherwise a factory, where there were employed a number of persons exceeding twenty, came under the operations of the law. His Bill provided that where the number of employees exceeded five, in such cases the Act would be operative. A schedule was supplied in the Bill giving a list of the factories affected, so as to prevent misunderstanding. Another clause of the Bill provided that factories should not escape the operations of the law in cases where the work was sub-let. The word "child" in section five was changed to "boy," so as to prevent its being construed to include girls. The change would prevent girls under 14 being employed. The Bill provided that canning factories and fruit and vegetable-drying factories should be given the additional month of October wherein employees might work over ten hours a day, but in all factories where women and girls are employed 45 minutes additional will have to be allowed for an evening meal. No children would be, however, allowed to work after 9 p. m. in such canning factories. Persons charged with violation of the Act would be allowed to testify in their own behalf.

The Bill was read the second time.

Several petitions were presented praying for the abolition of exemptions.

On motion of Mr. A. M. Ross, an order-in-council was ratified placing the St. Vincent de Paul Hospital, Brockville, on Schedule A of the Charity Aid Act and granting aid to it from Nov. 28th, 1877, and also placing the sum of $277.80 in the estimates on account of work done by the hospital.

In reply to Mr. Meredith, Mr. Hardy said the Government could not refuse aid to a hospital merely because there were two hospitals in a town or city. The line had not yet been drawn in this respect.

Mr. Meredith said that some settled policy should be adopted, as the expenditure on charities was increasing to an alarming rate, and was now about $80,000 a year.

At the request of Mr. H. E. Clark (Toronto), Mr. Fraser allowed the order for the House going into committee on the Bill to amend the Factories Act to stand for a day or two, in the expectation that the report of the inspectors would be printed then.

Mr. Fraser said that the printing department appeared to be in a congested state.

Mr. Meredith said the Government should take steps to prevent the congestion taking place. The House ought not to be inconvenienced in this way every session.

Mr. Fraser moved the second reading of the Bill to amend the Workmen's Compensation for Injuries Act. He explained that the Bill extended the Act to cases of injury caused by defects in either the machinery, premises, etc., or their arrangement. The Bill removed the restriction which defined superintendents to be men not engaged in manual labor. Another section corrected the mistake in the Act which made the words "signal" "points," a compound word "signal-points." Section 6 of the Bill prevented an employer escaping liability under the Act by sub-letting the work to a sub-contractor. The sub-contractor was, however, not relieved from liability, but a workman was barred from getting double compensation. Section 9 permitted a workman to give evidence that there was reasonable cause for his neglecting to give notice of any defect he may have observed in the plant or machinery. The Bill provided that compensation awarded men be not exceeding either three years wages or a sum not exceeding $1,500, whichever award is found to be the larger. Other clauses of the Bill made good defective provisions in the Act relating to "want of notice," "distribution of compensation."

Mr. Meredith said he was glad the hon. gentleman had decided to adopt a more liberal view of the compensation recoverable—a view almost as liberal as that advocated by the Opposition a year ago, and which the hon. gentleman had then resisted.

The Bill was read the second time.

Mr. French moved the second reading of the Bill to amend the law of slander. He explained the difference between libel and slander, the former referring to written or printed utterances and the latter to spoken, and pointed out that under the present law a person might by words impute unchastity to a woman, and cause her much misery and suffering, and yet no action could be taken against that person unless some special damage could be proved. The passage of the Bill would help to preserve the peace, as male relatives of women slandered had now to take the law into their own hands. The Bill provided in brief that in actions for imputing unchaste conduct to a woman special damage need not be proved, and that a person using defamatory language regarding a woman could be punishable by fine or imprisonment to the extent of $50 and costs or six months in jail.

Mr. Meredith thought the Bill objectionable because it gave slandered women a remedy and not men. It ought to be an offence to impute unchastity to a man just as much as to a woman. Another difficulty was that the utterers of slanders against women were principally women gossips. In nine cases out of ten where actions were brought under this Bill, sympathetic juries would find for the woman plaintiff, although the man might be innocent.

Mr. Mowat said he liked the sentiment which prompted the introduction of the Bill, and he was glad it had been brought before the consideration of the House.

Mr. Harcourt supported the principle of the Bill.

Mr. O'Connor said he sympathized with the measure.

Mr. Waters supported the Bill.

Mr. Hardy thought the Bill would prove fruitful of litigation. It would open the gates wide to frivolous litigation and might cause more harm than good to women.

The debate was then adjourned.

Mr. Miller's Bill to amend the Municipal Act was read the second time.

Mr. Meredith asked whether the attention of the Government had been called to the recent decision of the High Court of Justice holding that certain provisions of the Act of last session intituled "An Act to provide against frauds in the supplying of milk to cheese or butter manufactories" are beyond the powers of the Legislature to enact—whether it is intended to acquiesce in that decision or to appeal therefrom.

Mr. Mowat answered in the affirmative to the first query, and said he did not intend to acquiesce in the decision.

Mr. O'Connor—To amend the Municipal Act.

Mr. Murray—To amend the Municipal Act.

Mr. Hudson—To amend the Municipal Act.

Mr. Balfour—To amend the Mechanics' Lien Act.

Mr. Gilmour—To incorporate the town of West Toronto Junction.

Mr. Waters—To amend the Municipal Act respecting the appointment of jailers.

Mr. French's Bill to amend the law of slander was read the second time, and referred to a special committee.

The following Bills were read the second time:

To amend the Snow Fences Act—Mr. Dack.

To amend the Assessment Act—Mr. Balfour.

To amend the Municipal Act—Mr. Graham.

To amend the Municipal Act—Mr. Balfour.

To amend the Assessment Amendment Act, 1889—Mr. Fraser.

Don'ts for Nurses.

Don't let stale flowers remain in a sick chamber.

Don't be unmindful of yourself if you are in the responsible position of nurse. To do faithful work you must have proper food and stated hours of rest.

Don't appear anxious, however great your anxiety.

Don't forget that kindness and tenderness are needful to successful nursing. Human nature longs to be soothed and comforted on all occasions when it is out of tune.

Things One Would Rather Not Have Said.

Mrs. Jobson—Why, my dear Mrs. Hobson, I am surprised to see you in this sombre dress. I had not heard of any affliction in your family.

Mrs. Hobson—Oh, yes, indeed, Mr. Hobson died six weeks ago.

Mrs. Jobson—Why, how shocked I am I never knew of it at all. I would have been oglad to attend his funeral, if I had known.

Dear Sympathetic Heart.

Emily—What are you crying over, dear?

Julia—Longfellow's Evangeline! It makes me sad that women don't appreciate love and constancy as they should.

(Servant enters with cards.)

Julia (after reading them)—Chollie Jones and Freddie de Browne. Oh, how lovely! Come down with me and help in the fun. I am engaged to both of them.

Ready to Graduate.

Old Lady—"Do you think, my dear, that you are mistress of all the housewifely accomplishments which a woman should have before she marries?"

Sweet Girl (engaged)—"Yes, indeed. I have learned how to knit smoking caps, and yesterday a married friend of mine took me to an intelligence office to teach me the difficult art of selecting servants."

Astronomy Made Easy.

Hostess—And so you really believe the moon to be inhabited, Professor?

Prof. Einzumachen—Ah, vell, I do not say zat. But zere is vun moon in which zere mus' be vun man.

Hostess—And which might that be pray?

Prof. E. (putting on his party manners)—Vy, ze—vat you call it?—ze honeymoon.

Ingratitude.

"Just think, here I have been paying for my nephew's lessons in singing, and what do you suppose he does in return? He always sings his songs to me!"—Fliegende Blatter.

The Spanish Senate yesterday, by a vote of 66 to 53, rejected the motion of Senator Cuesta, a protectionist, to raise the import duties on cereals.

THE LITTLE HIGH CHAIR.

A Scene That Brought Tears to the Old Auctioneer's Eyes.

There was an auction at one of the down town auction houses recently. A pale, sad faced woman, in a plain calico gown, stood in a crowd. The loud voiced auctioneer finally came to a lot of plain and somewhat worn furniture. It had belonged to the plain woman, and was being sold to satisfy the mortgage on it. One by one the articles were sold, the old bureau to one, the easy rocker to another and a bedstead to a third. Finally the auctioneer hauled out a child's high chair. It was old and rickety, and as the auctioneer held it up everybody laughed—everybody except the pale faced woman. A tear trickled down her cheek. The auctioneer saw it, and somehow a lump seemed to come up his throat, and his gruff voice grew soft. He remembered a little high chair at home, and how it had once filled his life with sunshine. It was empty now. The baby laugh, the two little hands that were once held out to greet "papa" from that high chair were gone forever. He saw the pale faced woman's piteous looks and knew what it meant; knew that in her eye the little rickety high chair was more precious than if it had been made of gold and studded with diamonds. In imagination he could see the little dimpled cherub which it once held. could see the [illegible] grasping to the rattle box and pounding the [illegible] could see the little feet which had kicked the paint off the rounds, heard the crowing and laughing in glee—and now the little high chair was empty. He knew there was an aching void in the pale faced woman's heart, there was in his own. Somehow the day may come and go, but you never get over it. There is no one to dress in the morning, no one to put to bed at night. "Don't laugh," said the auctioneer, softly, as somebody facetiously offered ten cents, "many of you have little empty high chairs at home which money would not tempt you to part with." Then he handed the clerk a bill out of his own pocket and remarked, "Sold to the lady right there," and as the pale faced woman walked out with the little high chair clasped in her arms, and tears streaming down her cheeks, the crowd stood back respectfully, and there was a suspicious moisture in the eyes of the man who had bid ten cents.—Detroit Free Press.

The Horses were Spared.

When Mr. Cole, a well-known circus proprietor in the South, sold his stock in New Orleans, three dancing horses that he had owned for years went with the others by mistake. Mr. Cole at once bought them back, saying that he would never consent to have the horses become the property of any one who would make them work, and he had decided to put them to a painless death. He proposed bleeding them to death, but W. B. Leonard, a liveryman, suggested that the use of chloroform would be a better and less painful mode. This was finally decided upon, and a reliable man procured, who was to have performed the operation. They were all collected in the circus tent. There was Cole, Leonard, the riders and the clowns, the ringmaster, the tumblers and the leapers, and the three pet duns. Calling the little mare by name, he told her to kiss them all good-bye. The intelligent animal, stretching forward her head, kissed each one. This was more than they could stand, and the sacrifice was put off. Cole had no place to take them to, so Mr. Leonard promised to find some one who would assume charge of them, under a guarantee never to work them, but to keep them in good order until death should claim them for the grave.—St. Louis Republican.

Blind Boys on Bicycles.

A very novel feature is to be introduced into the Asylum for the Blind to be established in this city. Dr. Campbell, of the Royal Institute for the Blind, in London, who is expected to be in charge of the asylum here, aroused the greatest interest in the world's metropolis when in last September he selected a class of blind pupils, whom he taught to ride on the bicycle, and they, with him in the lead, rode from London to Derby. The distance between the two places is 126 miles, and a remarkable fact in connection with the feat was that no accidents occurred on the way. Dr. Campbell will follow out his ideas on this subject when he takes charge of the asylum here. Besides teaching his blind pupils how to ride on bicycles, Dr. Campbell believes in putting them through other courses of athletic training. He teaches his pupils how to box, swim, pull an oar, run races, etc. The speed and proficiency acquired by some of the pupils in these athletic sports are regarded as phenomenal, and it is said to be one of the most interesting sights imaginable to see two blind pupils put the gloves on and have a regular scientific set-to.—Pittsburg Times.

A Self-Made Man.

New Chicago pastor—"Of what State is your husband a native, Mrs. Veneer?

Mrs. Veneer, of Chicago—"Connecticut I believe, sir."

"Do you know in what part of the State he was born?"

"I don't think he was ever born, sir. I so often hear him speak of himself to other as a self-made man."

The Butterfly Girl is Coming Back.

The tailor-made gown was English. Its strong points were chest and shoulders. But the tailor-made gown is going. Womankind is French these days. Look at the Directoire maiden in her clinging robe.

She Misunderstands.

Miss Canada (blushingly)—I am sorry, sir, but I can never be anything more to you than a sis——.

Uncle Sam (aghast)—Christopher Columbus, young woman! You misunderstand me. I'm not courting you. I am only offering to be a father to you.

THE PENNSYLVANIA DUTCH.

A Strange People Who Have a Language Made Up of Many Others.

It is not generally known, even by people who have visited America, that there is in Pennsylvania, very near the cities of Philadelphia and New York, a population of more than two million inhabitants which is in many respects strangely like what its rural ancestors were in Germany more than two centuries ago. Some years since there were to be seen in a shop in Philadelphia several large books of Lutheran devotion, in the type and spelling of 1540, bound in deeply stamped white vellum, with heavy brass clasps. They did not look like imitations of old books, says the Boston Transcript, they seemed to be "the thing itself," but the date was recent. "They are for the Pennsylvania Dutch," said the bookseller. "They would not believe that the Lord would hear them if they prayed to Him out of a modern-looking book. And those books, as you see them, have been printed and bound in that style for nearly 300 years for the Pennsylvania Dutch market, just as they were printed for their ancestors during the Reformation.

There is probably no more striking instance of conservatism to be found anywhere in Europe than this but the spirit manifested by the worthy "Dutchmen" is carried out by them consistently in everything else. "Follow thy father, good son, and live as thy father did before thee" is their golden rule of life. Firstly they always speak among themselves a singular patois called Pennsylvania Dutch, from the word Deutsch. "It belongs," says Dr. H. Harbaugh, "to the South German dialects, and, while partaking of all, "it is most closely allied to the Pfalzisch"—that is, to the Rhine German of the Palatinate. In the valley of the Susquehanna and beyond the Alleghany it is much mingled with English. Farther in the west we find in its traces of Scottish, Irish, Swedish and French. It is specially remarkable in its having retained great numbers of old and curious German words, such as are now to be heard only in the remotest places of the fatherland. We find the influence of the unchangeable English article the in der. Thus a man will say: Hen—schnerr der hund. Gedt ab, mer welle up der markt fahre. "Henry, harness the blind horse we will go to market."

Old King Cole
Was a merry old soul
And a merry old soul was he.

But His Royal Majesty would never have been so merry had he suffered from constipation, or deranged liver, or dyspepsia, or piles, or any other complaint that comes from a system out of sorts and causes impurities of the blood. If you suffer from any of these things you will feel morose, melancholy, mournful, aye, mad or anything else but merry. To be merry you must be well. To be well take Dr. Pierce's world-famed Pleasant Purgative Pellets. Easy to take, purely vegetable, perfectly harmless, prompt and pleasant in their action. Only one for a dose.

A Clear Conscience.

Editor Cheap Monthly—I tell you it makes a man feel good to do a noble action. I'll sleep well to-night.

Admiring Wife—Have you rescued some children from cruelty or saved a life, my dear?

Well, no, not exactly, but to-day a young woman who has been furnishing me with beautiful poetry for three years without charge, came into the office and I gave her fifty cents.

Jewels and Laces.

No girl with fine jewels of diamonds
Or lace that were rare
Is as fair as the girl who has health.

What are your jewels and what are your laces worth to you? You would give them all if you could get back your health. Well, you can and you can keep your jewels and your laces too. Thousands of women know by happy experience that Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription restores the health. It is a positive remedy for those derangements, irregularities and weaknesses so common to woman. In fact, it is the only medicine for women, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee, from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle wrapper and faithfully carried out for many years.

Feversham,

From our own Correspondent.

The soiree that came off last Thursday, was a great success. Proceeds $48.

I think our town is looking up, as we are to have an implement shop start in Hall Bros. old stand. I think it is a Mr. Shield, from Collingwood. We wish him success.

The organ agent has left town suddenly. His absence is felt.

Business has been at a stand still this last few weeks, on account of the storm. We are to have a social on Monday night in connection with the soiree. It hangs out well.

Mr. John Hudson lost his shingle mill and crusher about a week ago by fire. It is a heavy loss to him, as he is only partially insured.

Pat, one of our army soldiers, went to Dundalk on Saturday to help the officers there. He must have felt proud of his help.

General News.

The fire in Brandon on Wednesday night caused a total loss of nearly $50,000.

Mr. Colter, M. P. for Haldimand, took his seat in the House of Commons Thursday.

Dr. Landerkin's resolution to give feeders of stock the same advantage as is granted to distillers in respect of the duty on corn was voted down in the House of Commons Thursday night by 111 to 71.

The half-breeds of Dakota are resisting the payment of taxes, and bloodshed is feared.

John Lee, who shot and killed Charles Chelme at Brandon, was hanged Friday. The killing took place over a girl.

An effigy of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain was burned in Dundee on Thursday night, and a resolution of confidence in Mr. Gladstone was passed.

Mr. Gladstone passed through Rome Thursday evening. Premier Crispi met him at the station. The G.O.M. declined to remain in Rome.

Sir George Baden-Powell is hurrying back from the Pacific coast and wishes to reach England for the opening of Parliament. He says the C.P.R. is one of the best equipped roads he ever travelled over.

Richard Benedict, aged 20, of the township of Crowland, went crazy Monday morning and nearly beat his mother to death, after which he assaulted a neighbor, to whose house he went in a nude state. He was finally fastened down by neighbors.

The Surgical Strawcutter.

Cowed in Beeton World.

Opposition is the life of trade and the steam straw cutter threatens to outdo the buzz saw in the art of speedy amputation. When in repose the straw-cutter's open face has a cold but not repulsive or bloodthirsty expression. That it is a determined article is seen at once by its square jaw, and proven by the way it goes through anything it takes hold of. During the major portion of the year its appetite is like that of a human calf in his first love experience, but once it gets on a whirl its appetite is rapacious. Its molar teeth are at the back of its head, the incisors being at the front. A man places the provender in its shovel shaped beak and gently but swiftly presses it between its jaws, and the process of mastication proceeds with the same earnestness of purpose as a woman's jaw working a gum game.

By constantly pandering to its abnormal desire for straw a man thinks he may have conquered the cutter's desire for blood, but if he attempts to use his hand or mitten as a napkin to wipe some objectionable features from its upper lip his digits are seized and can usually be picked up near the front hoofs of the cutter in delicate slices and before it can be stopped it has carried the knife to its mouth several times and licked up so much of its feeder's private gore that henceforth he will need but one glove. Seldom does it partake of any portion of the human frame but the hand, differing in this from the toothsome buzz saw which cuts into a human at any point. The strawcutter in a sense becomes domesticated but it never can be tamed; when driven to desperation by a geo around horsepower or throbbing engine it is not advisable to attempt to pry open its mouth with the idea of telling its age by the look of its teeth. Never ask it to "take something" for such is its instaiable thirst that the usual "two fingers" gives it no satisfaction.

Two Italians were tabbed in a quarrel near Lachine, on Friday night, one of them being fatally wounded.

THE SLEIGH BYLAW.

Some of the border papers of this county are kicking because of the late action of the County Council in regulating the width of sleighs. They say that the new standard is some six inches wider than the prevailing width in surrounding counties and will work much hardship with farmers whose markets are outside of the county. We cannot altogether agree with them. Of course no reform was ever hailed with cries of gladness. [illegible] manufacturers, more or less. [illegible] we think the hardship will [illegible] temporary character. [illegible] roads leading to the country towns are [illegible] in many cases [illegible] to 8 feet 3 inches or [illegible] feet in width. The roadway is generally broad, and inconvenience [illegible] be experienced upon them for sleighs of a maximum width of 8 feet 9 inches. In individual cases, where back roads have to be traversed in order to reach [illegible] ways, no doubt a little inconvenience will be experienced, but even this will very soon regulate itself. No doubt surrounding counties, in deference to the request of our County Council, will pass similar bylaws and assist in evening matters.

Fact is this should be made a provincial matter, and dealt with by our Legislature. In that way [illegible] form could be met with very little inconvenience to any person. It would have been a timely question for the Farmers' Institute to take up.

The Port Arthur Sentinel publishes a despatch which ought to make the nations of the earth quake with fear and trembling. It is to the effect that a Canadian—a Canadian mind you—Mr. Silas Griffis, of St. Catharines has invented an "unsinkable" ship with "unbreakable" hawsers, which is destined to just run away with anything that floats on earth, sea or sky; it is also to be provided with an "irresistable" sword of immense magnitude which will make mince meat of the anatomy of any war ship which may lower its neck to the blade. It will be more powerful than the sword of Damocles, or even the marvelous blade which shaved Shagpat. According to the despatch Mr. Griffis will get $20,000,000 for his patent, and the United States Government are now building twenty of these engines of war. Shrieve yourselves, shrieve yourselves, ye nations of the earth. Eros is dead and Mars reigns, as the ancient Roman said. It must be true, for the Sentinel is not an annexation newspaper.

The Times-Parnell commission, which has been dragging its weary length along for months, is near its end. The case of the Times has collapsed. It depended almost entirely upon the evidence of one Piggott, and the latter in his evidence has proved himself a perjurer, forger and liar. An English paper, commenting on Pigott's evidence, says:

"The connection between the Times and the Government is two-fold. The Government created first the commission and second the Times case. If Attorney-General Webster had not been enabled to play the parts of prosecutor, judge and framer of the indictment there could have been no tribunal at all. If he had assured Lord Salisbury that the letters would be proved to be genuine the commission would not have been created and the Unionists would never have suffered such a blow as, by their own piteous admission, awaits them. The Government chose the game, loaded the dice, selected its partners and arranged the rules of the game, and it must pay up now. The price is the dissolution of Parliament. We want to know what the country thinks of Pigott."

Pigott has created a greater sensation than before by confessing that he forged the letters which he testified were Parnell's and then escaping [illegible] unknown.

The Sarnia Observer tells how the farmers in that section were cheated thus: A butcher who bought some hogs was weighing them in a store where the appearance of something adhering to one of the weights attracted a farmer's attention. On removing it he found it was a piece of fat, in the centre of which a silver dollar was imbedded. By this trick the butcher gained fifteen pounds in every hundred.

JEWELER, MARKDALE

Little Violet.

There is mischief in your eye, little Vi! little Vi
There is danger in your bearing, I am sure.
Though your looks be even saintly, yet language can but faintly
Tell the difference twixt your acts and looks demure;
For instance, there's the baby; you kiss him and —it may be
That you never thought to do that youngster any harm,
But oft his yells and flinching tell of surreptitious pinching,
And the impress of your fingers on his tender little arm.

And I think you often try, little Vi! little Vi!
To be a mother, in your own peculiar way,
To dirty little Mollie, that fractured one eyed dollie,
Whom dearest Annie sent you on your natal
day;
Oh! how you whack and spank her, and then politely thank her,
As the humor takes betimes your little ladyship.
No wonder that, to Mary, the milkman said he'd "marry
Seed the bequal of 'er for a reg'lar little clip."

But I know of actions sly—little Vi! little Vi!
Towards the humble author of thy presence on this earth,
Who, in his peaceful study, oft ponders whether shou'd he
Be stern or laughter loving in thy fascinating mirth.
How well does he remember that night in calm
September,
When you saw your active parent spring high into the air,
And you know such worldly rising, and the poet's agonizing,
Was the bent pin you had left within his study chair.

Yet, when thou wert like to die—little Vi!
little Vi!
He knows the weight of grief that lay upon each heart,
And turned the coming morrow into utter woe
and sorrow
For those who strove to stay the grim destroyer's dart.
And when death's bolt miscarried, and the angel's coming tarried,
What joy within our walls when thy plaintive little cry
Told us the God of gladness had pity on our sadness—
Had touched, in pence, thy garment, little Vi!
little Vi!

ESTELLE'S INFATUATION: A NOVEL.

"Some one will like to have you with or without your money," said Estelle, by way of consolation. She thought of the gardener's daughter, and of their own pretty, well-mannered parlor-maid.

"And I should have the same answer to give that you have just given to me," returned Caleb, with a quietness that was in itself a reproach. "A man's heart, Miss Clanricarde, can no more be played battledore and shuttlecock with than a woman's. It stays where it has once been given."

Estelle gave another shiver.

"Don't say that!" she exclaimed.

"Well, no, you are right, Miss Clanricarde; that was out of the way," he returned; "and it's not me, but you, as we have to think of, and I cannot see my way for you. What will your mother, Mrs. Clanricarde, say to it?" he asked. "She knew that I was proud to have her promise, and that I was not wanting in my part. What will she say when nothing comes of it?"

Estelle looked scared.

"She will be very angry," she said, realizing the scene that would have to follow on this consultation.

"With you, Miss Clanricarde?"

"Yes, with me."

"And how will that be for you?" he asked, anxiously.

"I shall be very sorry," answered the girl, still with that shadow of fear over her sweet face. "But what else can I do, Mr Stagg? There is Charlie to think of as well as my father and mother. And then there is my promise. How could I ever look at myself in the glass were I to perjure myself, as I should do if I were to marry any one else? I cannot do other than I have done. It would be too sinful and shameful if I did."

"But it hurts me to think of your being troubled—of your mother, Mrs. Clanricarde, being vexed with you," said Caleb, his honest heart in his eyes.

"I must bear it as patiently as I can," answered Estelle, "unless——"

She stopped short, then looked at Caleb with a strange, suggestive, half-beseeching appeal in her beautiful eyes and quivering lips, which he read, but did not understand. She wanted something of him. What was it? The prayer was patent—the words inaudible. How could he come by their sense?

"Unless what, Miss Clanricarde?" he asked. "Is it aught I can do for you? Oh, but I would, even to die for you!" he added, not with a burst of tenderness so much as a solemn kind of declaration—a proffer of service wherein sacrifice would be for healing.

"It is mean of me to ask it," said Estelle, hesitatingly. "But mother will be so angry with me, and to be angry with you will not matter. But it is so mean and cowardly of me," she repeated. "Only you are so good!"

"If I can serve you I will. I can say no more, Miss Clanricarde," said Caleb, his lips, too, twitching nervously. She called him good! she whose favor he would have given his life to gain! What, indeed, would he not do to deserve her praise! She could not love him, but he could serve her. He could not rescue her from poverty by the devotion of his whole life, but she said that he could be of use to her. Would he not, then? Ay, gladly, even to the sacrifice of his life, if need be!

"You can, indeed, help me with my mother," said Estelle, a deep blush on her face—a blush of shame for her own cowardice and selfishness. "Tell her that it is you who will not marry me, not I who will not marry you. That I am willing, but that you of your own free-will will not."

Something passed through Caleb as if he had been struck about the heart. For a moment thought and life and clear perception of things, and even feeling, seemed to fail him, and he was conscious of only a sharp pain and a choking at his throat, so that he could not speak, and could scarcely breathe. This, then, was to be his crowning martyrdom. Of his own free will he was to renounce her—this exquisite treasure of loveliness, whom a king might well give his crown to gain. Ah, it was hard!

"You will, will you not, Mr. Stagg?" said Estelle's soft voice, pleading, enticing.

Still Caleb could not speak. His heart was too big, his throat too constricted, his anguish too great.

"It will be the greatest kindness you can do me," he heard her say. "Take it on yourself. Tell my mother you will not marry me, though I said I would marry you. I do not know what will become of me if you do not. Perhaps she will turn me out of the house and curse me. She said she would before I came out to you. I dare not tell her. But it will all come right if you give me up of your own accord, because I love Charlie. Do this, Mr. Stagg. I shall be so grateful to you, and so will Charlie," she added, with a girl's unconsciousness of cruelty to the man who loves her and whom she does not love—the woman's fidelity to the man she does love.

On that Caleb found his voice.

"Never mind him," he said, hurriedly. "I will do for you what will be a shame to me as a man; but I'll do it for you," he repeated huskily.

"How good you are!" said Estelle, beginning to realize the full meaning of the moment. "I can never thank you enough, nor repay you."

"If thou'rt happy, my bonny lass, that'll be my meed," said Caleb, with infinite tenderness, lapsing into his old forms of speech and accent, the intensity of his feelings causing him to forget his late manners. "If I can spare thee pain, what matters what such as I suffer? Thou shalt walk over the body of me if thou'st a mind."

He raised his hand—hers still lying on it—till his lips just touched the long white fingers athwart his. With the trembling reverence of a worshipper at a shrine, with the holy tenderness of a mother with her first-born, he just touched, he did not kiss, those precious fingers, white and fragrant as the petals of a lily.

"God bless thee!" he then said, with a sob that was as the sob of death—that was in very truth the sob of death for him—"God bless thee, my queenly lass, and may the Lord abide with thee always, to thy joy and gladness for ever and ever!"

"Don't, Mr. Stagg," said Estelle, beginning to weep.

He was no longer the distasteful omad'haun fit only for the laughter of the well-conditioned—the ungainly Beast whom no maiden born of woman could love. He was the hunchback whose wings had unfolded, the prince whose gross disguise was rent and cast away. She could not love him nor marry him, but she could respect and pity him—and she did.

"Now let us go, Miss Clanricarde," said Caleb, with the same kind of sad firmness he had shown at the first. "We know what we have to do, both one and t'other, and I think we understand each other. But, oh!" he added, with one last return to the old loving, yearning spirit, "whenever you think of them as loved you best, remember poor Caleb Stagg, the miner lad, who broke his heart to save yours a pang. Ay, my bonny queen, who would have died for you if so be as you would have lived. And greater love hath no man than that he should give his life for a friend. Now let us get this job over. I shall sleep lighter if I know that I have done your bidding and pleasured you, no matter how."

CHAPTER XII.

THE POWER OF LOVE.

Mrs. Clanricarde was ill in bed. That was but natural. Breakfast in bed and a bad headache when things go cross are to a woman what a sulky dinner at his club and a bottle of that claret with the yellow seal is to a man. And to weep unavailing tears with one's head buried in a pillow and one's mind possessed by spiteful thoughts is perhaps a better way, on the whole, of overcoming a trouble than to blot it out with wine stains, which obliterate everything save the memory of color, savor and fragrance.

Last night's scene with Caleb Stagg, or rather the disappointment and despair included in it, had temporarily disabled Estelle's mother.

Mrs. Clanricarde thought herself justified in her displeasure that Estelle had not conquered her rebellious heart, and thrown that intruding love once for all into space and the limbo of the past. It was her duty so to do, she argued; and a mother does well to be angry with a daughter who fails in her duty—loves where she ought not, and refuses money when she has the offer.

By all of which it came about that Estelle had a morning of full liberty, with Charlie Osborne waiting on chance in the wood hard by.

What is that we love in each other? Who can tell? It is not only beauty. "There is no such thing as that we beauty call, but fancy makes all as it lists," and to many unbeautiful creatures is given the most entire and heart-whole devotion. Nor is it necessarily youth; the old thank God for that when dear eyes shine with the light of love on their faded faces, and those who, had time ruled their ages straight, would have clasped them in their arms as lovers now lie on their hearts as children. Nor is it even intellect, else would those stupid amiabilities, of which we know so many, go wearily through life wanting that of which they have so great abundance now. Nor yet again is it goodness; for many whose souls stand shivering and naked, without so much as a rag of virtue to cover them—many cruel, vain, selfish, false—receive such passionate incense of love-worship so that no temple of the gods is more fragrant than theirs, and no car of Juggernaut drives over more faithful hearts than those which break at the feet of these smiling demons. We love because we love; and our love is no less strong because its genesis is obscured, and we cannot trace the flood to its source. All we know is the fact of that flood, on the margin of which bloom roses and forget-me-nots, or hemlock and the deadly nightshade.

Tried by certain tests, there was no question of comparative merit between Charlie Osborne and Caleb Stagg. Tried by others, the scale gave another measurement. In person, bearing, charm of manner, delightfulness of acquirements, flexibility of intellect, the penniless young artist, the unemployed Eudemon, stood supreme. For the mere human creature that he was, Venus might have taken him to replace Adonis—and she would not have found him so reluctant; and Libussa might have well exchanged her sceptre for his love. Had he and Hylas bathed together, the water-nymphs who drown men for their beauty would have chosen him as the fairest; and no Norseman would have mourned Baldur dead while Charlie Osborne had been alive. Everything was in harmony.

Like a bird running to her nest, Estelle stole quickly up the lane and into the leafy temple, where she knew she should find her shrine already tenanted. And, sure enough, there was Charlie, diligently sketching the forms and leafage of the trees, as a kind of excuse to himself, as well as to others who might see him sitting there in that holy place, waiting on chance and Estelle Clanricarde. When he saw her turn that corner and come swiftly up the narrow path, his heart leaped within him, and he sprang forward to meet her with a young lover's fervor and delight.

"This is a joy!" he said, ecstatically, holding her hands in his, and looking into her face with those insatiable eyes which no amount of looking satisfies. "My dearest! my darling! how dear of you to come! How have you been able to get away so early?"

"Mother has a headache, and is in bed; so I thought I would not be missed, and that we should be safe," said Estelle, laughing for very happiness. She did not realize her mother's headache. She thought only of being with Charlie.

"That is jolly," said Charlie, realizing the occasion no more than Estelle. "But, my stars! what has happened?" he asked, suddenly. "You have something to tell me; I can see you have."

"Yes, indeed, I have something very great to tell you," answered Estelle; "but not just at this moment, Charlie. Let us forget everything but each other for just a minute. Tell me of yourself—how you are; what you have been doing; where you have been; whom you have seen; everything that has happened to you since the day before yesterday—and then I will tell you my news."

But Charlie had no great events to tell. He had seen Lady Elizabeth, and finished the sketch of the water-mill in the lane leading down to Hindfleet; and he had not slept very well last night; and he had not eaten much breakfast to-day; and he had had a pain in his side and in his right temple; and now he was quite well and as jolly as a sand-boy, seeing that she was here. To which catalogue of insignificant ailments, magnified by love into dangerous symptoms, Estelle listened with a face that seemed really sad enough for threatened death, while her eyes grew brighter and larger and more tender than ever with the tears that lay behind them and crept slowly within the lids.

"Poor darling!" she said, "you want some one to take care of you."

"Yes—you," said Charlie. "I shall never be quite well till I have you as my sweet little wife. That is the only thing I am living for, Estelle. I believe I should die if I lost you."

"You shall not do that," she answered. "Do not be afraid, Charlie. I am yours now and forever, in life and to death. No one and nothing could part us!"

"Not even Mr. Caleb Stagg?" asked Charlie, with a fine disdain, that, as things were, looked almost like divination.

"No; that is all at an end," she said, simply. "That is what I have to tell you, darling. We have had such a scene at home! Such a dreadful time! Mother made that poor fellow propose to me! Just fancy! And I had to refuse him. That is why she has a headache to-day. Poor mother!"

"Why do you call him poor fellow, Estelle?" said Charlie, suddenly stiffened and chilled into a very human icicle.

"Because he behaved so well," said Estelle. "He was so generous and kind, and did all I wanted him to do so nicely, and bore mother's anger so bravely for my sake. He did behave well, Charlie!"

"Don't, Estelle!" cried Charlie, rising in wrathful agitation. "I cannot bear this. By heavens! I will go and insult the fellow. That he should presume—that he should have the insolence to lift his eyes to your face! He deserves a horse-whipping, and I have the best mind in the world to give him one"

"Charlie dear—" began Estelle.

"Don't!" he said, again interrupting her; "if you say a word in his favor you will send me mad!"

"Charlie dear!" she remonstrated again.

"Do you think it very pleasant for a man to hear the girl he loves praise and defend another fellow who has had the insolence to make love to her?" cried the angry upholder of love's exclusive privilege. "I tell you, Estelle, he deserves horsewhipping, and for the turn of a hair I will give him one!"

"Well, I will not say anything if it vexes you," said Estelle, meekly. "You see, I was bound to tell you the truth, dear, else I would not have spoken of it at all."

"And you would have kept secrets from me?" he said, in an aggrieved voice.

"No. It is because I could not do this that I told you," was her patient answer.

"The scoundrel! How dare he!" fumed Charlie.

She did not speak. She only slid her hand within his arm, and gave it a little squeeze with her fingers.

"Now you are sulky," said Charlie, with the injustice of his kind.

"Indeed, darling, I am not," she answered, her sweet eyes full of love and tears.

"What a brute I am?" cried her handsome tyrant, suddenly penitent and submissive. "Now I have made you cry. What a vile temper I must have! I am not worthy of your love, Estelle."

"You are worthy of ten times more, if I could possibly feel it. But I cannot," said Estelle.

On which he kissed her, and the little skirmish ended in the way in which their little skirmishes—which, by-the-way, were all on his side—always did end.

Then, having come to his rational and natural senses again, Charlie condescended to note particulars of the affair; and when Estelle had told him all, even he was constrained to admit that the omad'haun had behaved like a gentleman and a man of honor, and that he was not half a bad fellow after all; and really he, Mr. Osborne, might almost forgive him this involuntary trespass on his own property, so handsomely repented of and atoned for.

Meanwhile a princely patron was in course of moulding for Charlie Osborne's benefit; and Anthony Harford was steaming across the Atlantic in the Greyhound. The gods were creeping on with their feet of wood, and in a short time would be up with those on whom they were minded to lay their hands of iron. Old Herrick's advice was never more timely than now, and to gather rose-buds while they might was the young lover's highest wisdom.

CHAPTER XIII.

ANTICIPATIONS.

In the lane down the hill, where the worn old water-mill was the picturesque point much affected by artists, lived the Asplines, at their pretty place called Hindfleet.

Mrs. Aspline's story was not unique, nor yet was it disgraceful. A buxom cook to a rich old bachelor, she had filled with credit all the offices connected with the tradesmen's books and the kitchen range. Her master married her, as her spotless discretion demanded and deserved, and dying when their little daughter was but 5 years old, left her as buxom a widow as she had been a cook and a wife, and the assured possessor for her life of his handsome fortune. At her death it passed on to Anne, who was thus an heiress worth any man's looking after.

Besides being a woman of means, Mrs. Aspline was also a woman of strong good sense and of more than average ability.

Being rubicund and stout, she dressed in the austere dignity of black, which somewhat concealed the exuberance of her lines and toned down the warmth of her carnations. She never committed the mistake of wearing color, not even in her cap or bonnets, nor in the warmest months of summer allowed herself the betraying "liquefaction" or vapory expansion of flimsiness in material. She had the softest velvets, the richest satins, the thickest silks, to be had for love or money; and she broke up the dead surfaces with lavish powderings of jet, which still further concealed her outlines, and made her inches yet more delusive. As hospitable as an Arab whose gourd hangs on the outside of his tent, no mouth came to her amiss; and from wayside beggars to Lord Eustace himself no meal was withheld from those who cared to take their share. Thus, thanks to her tact, good sense, discernment of social motives, and strict observance of certain unwritten laws touching the implied subserviency of relative inferiority, Mrs. Aspline, of Hindfleet, had conquered a position in Kingshouse which else might have held out against her to the end; and some of the people of the place made it a point of Christian charity to forget the cook they had never known, and to recognize only the widow of a gentleman—the possessor of a handsome fortune, and the mother of a desirable heiress.

Others, however, did not; notably Mrs. Clanricarde, who had a daughter to marry, and no son for whom to find a wife. Had the sex of her child been reversed, her action would have been reversed too. As things were, Anne Aspline was in her way, not on her side; and the spit was held up as an unconquerable barrier between their houses. The miner's pick did not count.

For herself, Anne was pretty enough to have floated safely on the social wave had there been no such shining sails of gold to carry her forward. She was a fair-haired, gentle-mannered girl, who bore no salient marks of her maternal ancestry, save that she had square topped fingers, with broad, flat, opaque white nails, and that her ears stood out from her head like jug-handles. They were not large, nor fleshy, nor badly shaped, but they were distressingly prominent, and seen from behind made her pretty small head more animal than human. Save these two sign manuals, stamped by nature on the living parchment, she had a clear pedigree enough, and her inheritance contained more than the mere money which had to come to her on her mother's death. In temperament she was languid, in constitution anæmic. She had an unappeasable appetite for day-dreaming, and she was great in the art of doing nothing. Indolent and unpractical, she never did a hand's turn for herself that she could get any one else to do for her, and she quite understood the Eastern's contempt for unnecessary physical exertion. She never worked and rarely played, though she had been taught embroidery by a mistress and the piano by a master. By which it may be seen that, nice dear girl as she was, our Anne was decidedly a goose, and entirely wanting in that kind of commonsense grip of which her mother had so much, and of which she made such good use.

Mr. Aspline had had full belief in his wife's integrity and prudence. All the same she was only a woman, and whether you say, with the gallant Francis, "Souvent femme varie, bien fol qui s'y fie," or, in the dalesman's vernacular, "Women are kittle cattle to shoe ahint," it comes to much the same thing. Hence, although he had left the interest of all he possessed to his widow for her life, he had strictly entailed it on his daughter and her children; so that the one should not be able to enrich a second husband beyond her own natural term, and if the other grew up plain or weak-minded it would not be to the advantage of any scoundrel to marry her for her money one week and poison her for full possession the next. If she did not marry and bear children the money was disposed of in other ways; and to neither women was left the power of making a will—not even of her savings. For trustees he had left two old friends of his—one a Major Campbell, and the other Jack Harford, of Thrift. Major Campbell had renounced the trust from the beginning, and just now Jack Harford had died; but his son Anthony, who had been travelling in America—who had, indeed, been living in America for some years—was on his way home to take up his father's affairs, and among other things to see about the trusteeship to the Asplines, whom he had known when a lad, and remembered with pleasure now as a man. "Cookey," as the irreverent young scamp used to call Mrs. Aspline, had always been kind and generous and good to him and his; and little Anne had been the prettiest and softest and whitest sort of plaything possible—as much like a powder-puff or a poodle puppy as a little girl in white frocks and multitudinous frills—good to toss up into the air and catch as she came down, or to carry on his shoulder, while she clutched his short curled hair and screamed with delight when he kicked like a donkey or pranced like a horse. Perhaps she had been too much of a cry-baby for a vigorous young scamp thirteen years her senior to be always quite patient with; but, on the whole, he had managed pretty well, and had been able to curb his natural ferocity to a quite commendable extent when the wee waterspout cried for a mere nothing and squeaked for less than nothing. So that, mingled with regrets for the father whom he had not seen for so many years, and regrets for the friends and intimates he was leaving behind, were pleasanter speculations as to how he should find his old friends "Cookey" and pretty wee Anne—now, of course, grown up and come to the stateliness of Miss Asplinehood.

They on their side speculated on the change time must have worked on him, and came to the conclusion that, having been so long in America, he must needs be a perfect barbarian by now—and what a pity it was that an English gentleman should so spoil and lower himself!

"I hope he will not think it necessary to come here," said Mrs. Aspline, looking round her pretty drawing-room with its ship-load of furniture and ornaments. "I would so much rather transact all my business with him by letter or at the lawyer's; for of course he will have that horrid habit of chewing tobacco and spitting all over the place, and that will be too disgusting, you know."

"Detestable!" said Anne.

"I wonder if he has been living much with the Indians?" then said Mrs. Aspline. "Perhaps he is married to a squaw in beads and a blanket. One never knows what these wild young men are up to when they are once out of one's sight."

"No," said Anne, visions of Lara and the Corsair making a hotch-potch of ideas with Prince Florizel and the Reverend John Creedy. "It is dreadful to think of," she added, with a little shudder.

"And if he brings his wife home with him, and she carries her babies in a basket at her back, how very painful it will all be!" continued Mrs. Aspline, who was fond of reading books of travel.

"I wonder Mr. Harford let him stay away so long," said Anne, who was the freest if the most indolent she alive. "If the first Mrs. Harford had lived, it would have been different. She would have brought him home long ago," she added.

"Yes," said Mrs. Aspline; "a mother has more power in a family than any father can have. Better lose a dozen fathers than one mother; for even the best men are but poor creatures in a house compared to women."

She spoke with that curious conviction of superiority by the grace of sex characteristic of the women of to-day. She had been made by her husband, but she believed that she had been the sole architect of her fortunes, while her master and his thousands had been but the hodman with his bricks.

A Woman's Warm Heart.

In a cabin on a sunny hillside overlooking the Bay of Dublin was a helpless cripple, entirely dependent upon his sister's exertions, and on her death a car was sent from the poorhouse to bring him thither for shelter. The poor wretch clung to the only home he had ever known, and utterly refused to leave it, crying that he would die if deprived of his "say air and shut up in prison wall." His loud lamentations had brought the priest and some of the neighbors by his side, and one of the latter, Maggie O'Flynn, felt a deep impulse of pity toward the unfortunate man. She was a single woman of about 55, of weather beaten and certainly not attractive appearance. She acted as head on the estate of a gentleman close by, to whom her services were invaluable. "Hould hard," she said to the workhouse officials; "it's not Maggie O'Flynn that 'nil see a poor craythur taken to the poorhouse when she can give him a shelter. It's a corner and a welcome in me own cabin Mick Castillo shall have." But here his reverence interposed and vowed he would allow no such scandal in the parish as an unmarried man and woman sharing the same dwelling, cripples or no cripples. "Shure, Maggie, you won't go back on your word?" implored poor Mick. Maggie hesitated a moment, then turning to the priest said: "If there's no other way to save him from 'the house,' your reverence, I'll marry him, an' sorra a haporth will any one be able to say agin it thin." It was in vain his reverence pointed out the terrible burden Maggie was taking upon herself. "It's for the love of God I'm marryin' him an' not to plase meself," was the answer she returned; "an' sure the blessed Virgin will niver let me want for the bite an' the sup when she sees me sharin' it with the craythur that has naythur." The marriage took place, and until his death, several years later, the kind-hearted Maggie O'Flynn carefully tended and supported the poor helpless cripple in her own cabin.

Odd Transatlantic Notes.

A Milan newspaper, the Secolo, is publishing the Bible in 210 half penny parts of eight pages each and 900 wood cuts.

In Rome there are 30 cardinals, 35 bishops, 1,469 priests, 2,215 nuns and 3,000 monks, friars, candidates, etc.

The Bank of England is the most extensive banking institution in the world. It employs over 1,000 clerks, and its buildings cover more than eight acres.

The French Minister of Education has offered a gold medal for the best French scholar to be found in English schools. His offer is intended to encourage the study of French.

A banker in Lille, France had the misfortune to wet eighteen bills of the Bank of France, and in order to dry them he placed them on a board at an open window where the sun shone upon them. They dried more rapidly than was anticipated. A gust of wind carried them into the street, where, unfortunately, a goat picking up odds and ends at once captured the bank bills and swallowed them. The goat was purchased and the bills secured in a very dilapidated condition, but the Bank of France recognized its obligations and redeemed them.

Living on a Penny a Day.

The Englishman, Dr. T. R. Allinson, has been trying the experiment of living on meal and water for a month. His daily allowance is one pound of whole meal made into a cake, with distilled water, and one quart of water. His account of his condition after a week is cheering. In the first days he felt hungry, but about the fourth day this disappeared, and he had no longer any craving for other food. His brain was clear, his lung capacity had increased five inches, and both his sight and his hearing had improved. He had lost seven pounds weight, but seemed to regard this as rather an advantage. Altogether he feels thoroughly satisfied with his experiment. It is a very economical one, the wheat for seven days having cost only eight pence. "This," he says, "is living on almost one penny a day and enjoying it."

He Chewed.

"I never smoke," said a theological student to his best girl, 'but atchoo!"

It was only a sneeze, but the maiden said she would never marry a man who chewed.

TAKING THE OATH.

Various Ways of Swearing in Various Parts of the World.

HOW PRESENT PRACTICES WERE STARTED.

The primary idea of taking an oath is that we call upon the Deity to bear witness to the sincerity or truth of what we assert, and so, as it were, register our oath in heaven. When Abraham, for example, raised his hands to heaven while swearing an oath to the King of Sodom, he pointed to the supposed residence of the Creator. Afterward, when men set up inferior deities of their own, they appealed to the material images or symbols that represented them, whenever an oath was administered. The most usual form of swearing among the ancients was, however, by touching the altar of the gods. Other rites, such as libations, the burning of incense and sacrifices accompanied the touching of the altar. Demosthenes swore by the souls of those who fell at Marathon. Anciently, too, mariners swore by their ships, fishermen by their nets, soldiers by their spears, and kings by their sceptres. The ancient Persians swore by the sun, which was the common object of their adoration, while the Scythians pledged themselves by the air they breathed and by their scimitars. Descending to more modern times, the Saxons pledged themselves to support their homes and privileges by their arms; and the punishment for perjury or non fulfilment of an oath was the loss of the hand that had held the weapon at the compact. The Spartans were wont to assemble around a brazier of fire, and, pointing their short swords to the sky, call upon the gods to bear witness to the compact. Swearing by the sword, in fact, retained its significance down to comparatively modern times, though in a slightly modified form. Thus, while the pagans extended the point of the weapon toward the supposed residence of the gods, the warriors of Christianity, after kissing it, directed the hilt—the true emblem of their faith—to heaven. A later form of oath was the pressing of the thumb upon the blade. Gradually, however, the practice became obsolete; and the kissing of the hilt, accompanying the words "By this good sword!" was handed down almost to the time when the wearing of a sword by gentlemen was abolished, as one of the strictest codes of civil honor. During the Grecian dynasty, whenever an Athenian householder made an oath, he caused his children to stand before him, and, laying his hand upon their heads, prayed that a curse might fall upon them if he swore falsely. If he had no children he pronounced destruction upon himself and his whole race, while he touched the altar of the gods or the victims upon it. Going back to Biblical times we find this curious rite in connection with the lives of Abraham and Jacob. The former says to his servant Eliezer: "Put, I pray thee, thy hand under my thigh, and I will make thee swear by the Lord, the God of heaven, and the God of the earth, that thou shalt not take a wife unto my son of the daughters of the Canaanites, among whom I dwell. But thou shalt go unto my country and to my kindred, and take a wife unto my son Isaac." The like ceremony is performed by Joseph when Jacob makes him promise to carry him out of Egypt and bury him in the tomb of his forefathers. The explanation of this is, that placing the hand upon the thigh was equivalent to swearing by the Messiah, who was to spring from the loins of Abraham. Afterward the Jews confirmed their oaths by touching the book of law, or their phylacteries, upon which extracts of the law are inscribed. The Mohammedans laid their hands upon the Koran. When, therefore, Christians kiss the Bible or lay their hands upon the tomb of a martyr, or any other sacred relic, the source whence the practice has been derived is at once recognized; yet it must be admitted that kissing the book is a distinctly Christian institution, founded upon the kiss upon the sword hilt by the Crusaders. —London Standard.

Discovery of Children.

In a school district in London there were many parents who reported no children in their families. In order to find just how many children were thus being kept from school, the school authorities got two monkeys, dressed them gayly, put them in a wagon in which was a brass band, and started through the district. At once crowds of children appeared and followed the wagon, which drove to a neighboring park, when the school officers went among the children distributing candies and getting their names and addresses. They thus found that over sixty parents kept their children from school; and as a result of the monkeys, the brass band and the candy about 200 little boys and girls have been set at study.

She Had Done Her Best.

A woman in the waiting-room of the Third street depot the other day had a great deal of trouble with one of her two children—a boy of seven or eight—and a man who sat near her stood it as long as possible, and then observed:

"Madam, that boy of yours needs the strong hand of a father."

"Yes, I know it," she replied, "but he can't have it. His father died when he was six years of age, and I've done my best to get another man and failed. He can't have what I can't get."—Detroit Free Press.

THE LADIES' COLUMN.

Fashionable Dresses That May be Worn on Easter Sunday.

SOME USEFUL RECIPES FOR ALL.

Taste in Personal Decoration, and How it Should be Cultivated.

(Cousin Kate's Weekly Budget.)

"Would ye know what's to be the thing for the springtime—what my fine lady will wear on Easter Sunday?" writes a New York lady correspondent. "Listen then. It will be a fine wool costume, in a faded tone of color, woven with a mottled effect, like Scotch mixed wool. It will have a woven border, consisting of graduated bands of a darker shade, which will encircle the petticoat. The draperies will be made up without seams, in sash effects, for the goods are forty-six inches wide; and the border follows all one side of it. On some pieces a diminutive border is woven along the outer edge for sleeve and waist trimmings. Should this not be fine enough for madame, there is a novelty much more costly. The same kind of wool material, yet even finer and softer, with a conventional pattern border embroidered in black embroidery silk, a la Chinoise, for the embroidery is alike on both sides. In all these colors does it come—black on old rose, black on serpent green, black on electric blue, black on copper, black on red, etc. By the way, speaking of reds, it is evident there are expectations that "the ladies" will fall down before the new reds, the flashy, dashy, striking reds! France was one blaze of bright color last year. It is our turn next. Perhaps the most effective thing in red was a fine wool, woven in stripes three inches wide, divided by a hair line of black, white or blue. These would look smart enough up among the mountains or on the deck of a yacht. Let us hope the salesmen will keep them in nice, smooth, even folds until wanted for such purposes. But what did they have for tailor-made suits? Soft wool, even checks, of white and faded tones of color; big gay Scotch plaids; fine smooth Henrietta cloths. Oh! Those Henrietta cloths in such soft pleasing colors were there. Those all wool are to be preferred to the silk warp for they do not grow stringy nor shiny as quickly."

Low-Crowned Hats and Chignons.

The new Paris hats are to have crowns so low as to be hardly perceptible from the front view. It is thought also that since the bustle has disappeared from the body the chignon of some years ago will again fasten itself to the head. Already great rolls of hair are to be seen at the back.

Lord Salisbury's Third Son's Marriage.

The bridesmaids at the wedding of Lord Salisbury's third son were dressed in white Irish poplin, having vests, collars and cuffs of red velvet, with full undervests of mousseline de soie.

A Matrimonial Pointer.

An exchange volunteers the information that if white clothing, say a dress, is put away in a drawer or closet it will become yellow, but if placed in a box lined with blue paper or wrapped in a dark blue cloth it will come out as white as ever, no matter how long it lies.

Did She Want to Trade?

This advertisement lately appeared in a London paper: "A young married lady, who dresses well and often tires of her things when quite new and fresh, would like to hear from a lady who takes the same measurements; height, five feet seven inches, bust 36 inches, waist 24 inches; court dressmaker."

Keep Warm.

Rose Terry Cooke says: "If you want to be happy keep warm. Women are eaten up with neuralgia, say the doctors. No wonder. They sit all the morning by a hot register, and then tie the five or six-inch strip of bonnet over their back hair, a bit of lace film over their bangs, put on kid boots, with silk or thread stockings underneath, and dawdle along the pave with bitter winds of winter smiting their temples, their delicate ears, their throats and the bases of what should be their brain. Their outward nerves shrink and quiver under this barbarous exposure. But no matter; their chests are well covered with fur cloaks and sacques, but cold feet, the numb ears, the reddened temples, the exposed neck will have their own story to tell. Then you won't wear flannel next the skin. Why? Because your waists will look too large, and it is the style to be as near in shapeliness to that delightful and lovely insect, the wasp, as humanity can be forced. Do you really like to ache and groan and to be laid aside every few days with agonizing headaches or panting, laboring hearts? Strange, if true!"

Fixings.

"When are you the happiest?" I asked a pretty young girl I know.

"When I can go to a big ball and be the best-dressed girl there," she replied promptly.

"But how about partners?" I suggested.

"Oh, they do not bother me. I always have enough, but it's the fixings for my ball dress that trouble me. You see, it does not cost very much for a dress, but all the fixings to it are what cost."

"Fixings," I was told, meant a pretty pair of slippers, silken stockings, long Suede gloves, a big fan and a ribbon to fasten it, an embroidered handkerchief, lace for the neck and sleeves, and flowers and hairpins. All these trifles cost money, and they must all be of the nicest, or even the effect of the most costly toilet would be spoiled.

Taste in Dress.

Dress an average woman in close-fitting serge or quiet neutral-tinted tweed; give her a spotless linen collar and cuffs to match; take away chains and gewgaws, and say if she ever looked better unless it was in a pink cotton cambric on a summer's morning with a rose at her throat instead of a brooch. Well-built women will do well to remember this when they seek to cover themselves with ribbons, braids and gimps, that serve only to fritter away the figure and are absolute death to the clear, fine outlines that should be followed with the greatest exactitude. After simplicity—a costly simplicity, if you will, or rather as a consequence of it—comes freshness, that most desirable quality which to a woman's dress is much the same as a fair, healthy skin to her face. To be simple, then, to be fresh at every point, are two long steps gained toward being well dressed. The third is a little longer and harder to take; it is to dress suitably, not only to your station and age, but to your house. Take your complexion first. If you are fair, with blue eyes, be you can wear every shade of blue from azure down to violet, but if you have green, grey or brown eyes you will only create a discordancy if you suffer a morsel of blue near you. On the other hand, a perfectly fair, green-eyed woman adds weirdness and charm to her fairness when she arrays herself in all the paler shades of green. For brunettes scarlet and amber, white and orange, though if there be the smallest tint of amber in the skin, orange may only be ventured on at night. Some women who might come under the heading of blondes stand vivid yellows and oranges well, but they must have some color and a skin transparently fair. But up to the age of 40, and sometimes beyond it, the typical healthy, fresh-looking woman is at her best in white, and at her very worst in black.

Recipes.

Griddled Oysters.—Wash quart of oysters and dry them by spreading on a towel. Have the griddle hot and put a bit of butter on it. Put the oysters on till the griddle is full. Turn each oyster over as it browns and serve hot on buttered toast.

Boiled or Steamed Pudding.—One cupful of beef suet chopped fine, or one-half cupful of butter, one cupful of molasses, two cupfuls of sweet milk, some baking powder in the flour; make it just a little thicker than pound cake; one cupful of raisins, one cupful of currants or one cupful of blackberry jam, one teaspoonful of allspice, cloves, cinnamon, one nutmeg; tie in a cloth and boil two or three hours, or put in a pan and steam three hours.

Vinegar improves by keeping, therefore it is best to lay in a large supply.

Tea, coffee or cocoa are three admissible drinks, but not in excess. For the voice the American Druggist recommends cocoa as the best. A cup of thin cocoa, just warm, is more to be recommended between the exertions of singing than any alcoholic beverage. Tea must not be taken too strong, nor when it has been drawn too long, for it then becomes acid and has a bad influence upon the mucous membranes of the throat. There is always a sensation of dryness after taking a cup of tea that has been allowed to draw too long.

To arrest hiccough Dresch directs that both ears be closed with the fingers, with pressure, while a few swallows of liquid are taken.

Chocolate Meringue Pudding.—Boil one pint of rich milk, add half a teacupful of butter, one teacupful of sugar and three ounces of grated chocolate; let it boil, and when cool add the whites of four eggs; pour this in a pudding dish lined with slices of sponge cake and bake; cover with meringue and let it brown. Eat with lemon sauce.

Berkshire Cookies.—One cupful of molasses, a teaspoonful of soda; dissolve in a half cupful of cold water, a dessertspoonful of salt; a tablespoonful of melted butter, one dessertspoonful of ginger, flour enough to roll out to the thickness of an inch. Bake in a quick oven for about ten minutes.

For and About Women.

Dr. Mary Walker has settled down to hard work. She is now the telegraph editor of a Washington newspaper.

Gray hair for women is becoming such a rage in Paris that locks which until lately would have been dyed a golden brown are now bleached white.

Mrs. Kendal, the actress, has invented an "omnibus" fan. Packed away here and there in its small compass are a pair of scissors, a glove-buttoner, a little mirror, hair-pins and quite a number of accessories to the toilet.

Says Ouida: "The uneasiness of women to imitate men, politically, personally and socially, is a distressing note of modern civilization. It is artistically a mistake; it is probably also one morally. . . To those who are still of opinion that the finest flower of womanhood is a sensitive plant best cultured in shade and silence this indication will not be welcome."

A walking costume is of myrtle green Amazon cloth, trimmed with moleskin. The skirt is plain and edged with the moleskin. It is covered by a drapery nearly forming a second skirt, caught up slightly here and there with a box pleat at the back. It is also edged with the moleskin. The bodice, in the soldat Francais style, is double breasted, with one row of Norwegian buttons down the left side; moleskin collar and cuffs and a band of moleskin down the centre.

One of the fashions of the year, which has reached a craze both here and abroad, is passementerie. From plain cords simply tied in large knots like a friar's girdle, to elaborate placques as intricately wrought as the richest laces, all sorts and kinds are represented, Greek, Roman, geometric, fanciful, floral and classical patterns being brought out in most wonderful and attractive combinations. Passementerie appears upon nearly every portion of dress, even at the throat as brooch or pendant, at the waist as buckle or belt, and on the fancy shoe, imitating a clasp.

Style in the Antipodes.

A writer in the London Standard says I see it noticed that a judge of the Supreme Court in Australia goes circuit on a bicycle. In Australia there is a pleasing informality on the part of eminent functionaries, the occupants of the Government bench sitting in Parliament sometimes in their shirt sleeves. A Queensland bishop has been seen carrying his trunk down from an hotel to the steamer, he taking one handle and a black porter, very imperfectly clad, taking the other.

An Obliging Defaulter.

We are reaching a very high state of civilization. The defaulting cashier doesn't even take the trouble to run away now. Cashier Gookin, we are told, visits the office of the Manhattan Elevated Railway Company every day to help them find out how much he really did take.—New York Herald.

Evolution of the Sermon.

Modern Minister (gloomily)—"It's easy enough to find subjects that will interest the congregation, the trouble is to find subjects that will interest the newspapers."

A GIANT'S BURIAL.

Funeral of the Late Colonel Goschen, Professional Anak.

The funeral of Col. Ruth Goshen, Barnum's biggest giant, who died last Tuesday on his farm near Clyde Station, N.J., took place yesterday morning. There was talk of a big display, but Rev. James LeFevre, into whose church Col. Goshen had been received since his illness, declared that he would not officiate unless the preparations were of a simple nature. Besides, Col. Goshen himself had wished the ceremony to be unostentatious. His only other wish was to be buried deep. So it was arranged to hold a quiet service in the farm house. Col. Goshen weighed 588 pounds, as attested yesterday by a merchant who had weighed him recently, and it was found no easy task to clothe the body. After half an hour's unavailing efforts Undertaker VanDuyn finally succeeded in bringing the clothing together in front of him by splitting it down the back. The dress selected was one familiar to museum-goers—a long blue coat with imitation astrakhan collar and cuffs, black satin waistcoat with brass buttons, and black broadcloth trousers with red striped seams. By the time the clothing had been arranged a crowd had gathered and an undertaker from New Brunswick had come to offer advice. The cloth-covered chestnut coffin was placed outside on the brick wall leading to the gate. Its top measurement was three feet by eight feet four inches, and it wouldn't go through the door. The body lay indoors on a stage of planks nine feet long. Four men, after much labor, raised the body a little and slipped a broad carpet sling under the waist, fitted at the ends with stout rods, each large enough to be grasped by two men. The arms were tied down and the legs were firmly strapped together with a horse's girth in such a way as to offer handles to two men, one on each side. The nine foot stage, with the body on it, was then carried outside and placed on the porch at right angles to the coffin. Here an interesting discussion arose. The New Brunswick undertaker wanted to place the stage over the coffin, lift up the body, withdraw the planking, and let the body down into the coffin. Mr. Van Duyn had arranged for eight men to carry the body by the straps and the iron rods to the coffin and lower it. Each presented his argument, and the pall-bearers and guests who had arrived gathered round and took part in the discussion. Mr. Van Duyn finally had his way, and the body was carried to the coffin and laid in it without mishap. The colonel's chestnut wig was then carefully adjusted over his kinky hair. An attempt to remove the sling from under him failed, so the rods were cut off and the carpet was left in the coffin. Then the coffin was hoisted upon boxes and left exposed until after the services. The great coffin was put in the undertaker's waggon as the hearse was too small. It was pushed up to the dashboard and the driver sat on one end of it. The other extended about a foot out at the back of the waggon. It was a bitterly cold morning, but a good many people went in carriages and on foot to Cedar Grove Cemetery and watched with expectant interest the lowering of the coffin into the biggest grave any of them had ever seen. But no accident happened.—From the New York Sun.

Who Said It.

Dean Swift is credited with "Bread is the staff of life."

It was Keats said: "A thing of beauty is a joy forever."

"Man proposes, but God disposes," remarked Thomas A'Kempis.

Franklin is authority for "God helps those who help themselves."

It was an observation of Thomas Southern that "Pity's akin to love."

"All cry and no wool" is an expression found in Butler's "Hudibras."

We are indebted to Colley Cibber, not to Shakspeare, for "Richard is himself again."

Edward Coke, the English jurist, was of the opinion that "A man's house is his castle."

"When Greek joins Greek then was the tug of war" was written by Nathaniel Lee in 1602.

Edward Young tells us "Death loves a shining mark" and "A fool at 40 is a fool indeed."

"Variety is the spice of life" and "Not much the worse for wear" were coined by Cowper.

Charles Pinckney gave the patriotic sentiment, "Millions for defence, but not one cent for tribute."

"Of the two evils I have chosen the least" and "The end must justify the means" are from Matthew Prior.

To Milton we owe "The paradise of fools," "A wilderness of sweets" and "Moping melancholy and moonstruck madness."

The poet Campbell found that "Coming events cast their shadows before" and "'Tis distance lends enchantment to the view."

Christopher Marlowe gave forth the invitation so often repeated by his brothers in a less public way: "Love me little, love me long.'

To Dr. Johnson belongs "A good hater," and to MacIntosh, in 1701, the phrase, often attributed to Randolph: "Wise and masterly inactivity."

Thomas Tasser, a writer of the 16th century, says: "It's an ill wind turns no good," "Better late than never," "Look ere thou leap," and "The stone that is rolling can gather no moss."

"First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his fellow-citizens" (not his countrymen), appeared in the resolutions presented to the House of Representatives in December, 1799, by Gen. Henry Lee.—Pittsbury Dispatch.

A Parental Admonition.

Stern Parent—"Johnnie, I am informed that you use a great deal of slang. Is it true?" "Yes, sir." "And I have cautioned you against the vulgar habit scores of times. I once more warn you that if you persist in using slang, I'll take that strap from the wall and you'll find yourself in the soup."

It must be a curious event, the proposal of a stuttering lover. He would have some difficulty in telling his fair one that she was the pup-pup-pearl of his life, and the dud-dud-darling of his heart.—Denver News.

THE ALUMINUM AGE.

What it Will be Like—Houses, Boats, Cars, Bridges, Flying ships.

The world has had its ages of stone and bronze. We are now passing through the iron age. Will this be succeeded by an age of aluminum? We believe that it will. It taxes one's imagination a little, we confess, but not one's credulity, to see, in the mind's eye, the bright and beautiful aluminum replacing black and ugly iron in most of the latter's present uses. Fancy houses built of aluminum instead of iron. The weight of the new metal is only a third as much as iron, with equal or greater tensile strength. The girders and the plates could be cast and readily handled in sizes far larger than those to which architectural iron is now confined. Perhaps whole fronts of moderate-sized houses could be made of the new metal. Railroad cars of such material would not be readily crumbled up or smashed into splinters by collisions. The perils of railroad travelling in the age of aluminum will be much less than now. The ductility of aluminum will render it the best of all possible materials for bridges. The weight of the wire ropes, as also of the bridge itself, for a given span, being but one third that of iron, engineers will perform feats of bridge building now wholly beyond their powers. The age of aluminum will be the age of bridges. They will probably be thrown over the East and North Rivers at intervals of every few blocks. With the sufficient cheapening of aluminum may come the realization of the flying machine. One great obstacle to the success of aerial navigation is the difficulty of supplying a practical motor either to propel or steer the balloon. The want is still more seriously felt if the design is to dispense with gas and imitate merely the movement of a bird's wings or a fish's tail in cleaving the air. The small weight of an aluminum engine, driven by compressed air, gas or electricity, compared with its iron equivalent, undoubtedly makes the ultimate success of air ships more probable than before. The sources of supply are inexhaustible. Iron, copper, silver, gold are found only in localities geographically small. But one of the most universally distributed materials of the earth beneath our feet is clay, the metallic base of which is aluminum. Having boundless faith in the ingenuity of man to overcome difficulties, we confidently expect him to wrest this now stubborn metal from its superabundant combinations, and enable the world soon to enter on the age of aluminum —New York Journal of Commerce.

Orange-Ribbon Reflections.

The devil speaks for a man in a passion.

Love may live an age if you do not marry it.

Every woman is Eve in some hours of her life.

The fire of jealousy burns with very little fuel.

On what strange solitudes every separate soul dwells.

Many roads lead to happiness besides the one we take.

It takes two to tell a lie—one to speak and one to listen.

A husband's name is a far bigger shield than a father's.

Truth can be outraged by silence quite as cruelly as by speech.

To the spider the web is as large as to the whale the whole wide sea.

Woman is never too angry to be without a mouthful of sweet words.

When girls are old enough for a lover they are a match for any gray head.

A man that gets the woman he wants very seldom gets any other good thing.

A daughter is a little white lamb in the household to teach men to be gentlemen.

A woman is not to be counted your own until you have her inside a wedding ring.

Eventful days are the results which months, years, perchance centuries, have made possible.

Who is free? The man who masters his own self. Who is powerful? He who can control his passions.

The future does not come from before to meet us, but comes streaming up from behind, over our heads.

All these inconveniences are incident to love: reproaches, jealousies, quarrels, reconcilements, war, and then peace.

All pleasure must be bought at the price of pain. The true pay the price before they enjoy it; the false after they enjoy it.

As there are in creation invisible bonds that do not break like mortal bonds, so also there are correspondence subsisting between souls, despite the separation of distance.—Collated by Kansas City Star.

Barbarians and Books.

Canadian Indians, Brazilians and Peruvians thought books and letters were spirits of live beings.

Tribes in Africa, South America and Oceanica thought the reader was conversing with the book, and Weddell said a Fuegian put the book to his ear in order to hear the sound of the voice that spoke to the reader.

A Long-Standing Error.

The Universities Press edition of the English bible contains a typographical error, which has remained uncorrected for fifty years. It is in the seventeenth verse of the eleventh chapter of Zachariah which reads: "Woe to the idol shepherd.' The word "idol' should be "idle."—New York Tribune.

Love's Young Dream.

Little girl (at school)—"What did the teacher send you here for?"

Little boy—"She said I was bad, and must come over and sit with the girls."

"I like you. Can you stay long?"

"Guess not. I wasn't very bad,"

"Well, you be badder next time."

No Uncertainty About It.

Adult Son—"Mother, does a girl mean to encourage or discourage a man when she——" Mother—"My son, there is no need of going into details. When a girl starts out to either encourage or discourage a man, the man never has any doubt about what she means."

A stroll through Mr. Beecroft's green house on Monday gave us a great deal of pleasure. Although not in their prime, and the bloom of flowers sparse at this season of year, still the promises were there of exquisite beauty yet to come. Foliage plants are pushing out their first new leaves, climbing vines pushing out dainty tendrils, roses bursting into bud, and rhubarb growing fast and rank. Soon our dining tables will be supplied with this latter and favorite dish, and our center tables adorned with boquets of living fragrance from the greenhouse. It is pleasant to contemplate with the mercury at from 10 to 15 below zero.

The following remarks from the Dominion Illustrated can be vouched for by every publisher of a newspaper. This description of people may be found in every locality: "A line or two may appear in a newspaper that may make a man an enemy to the newspaper for life. He will stop his subscription, but this act does not deter him from reading the paper. It simply changes him from a subscriber to a borrower, a filcher of the editor's work without compensation. There are numbers of individuals who will read this item and appreciate its pith. People of this class sometimes get into public life, when they have a nice time of it. It is a poor man who can't either take or give a crack occasionally."

The Canada Presbyterian marks the commencement of its eighteenth volume by an enlargement that must make this old established journal more than ever welcome to thousands of readers. The large addition to its size, and the high character of its Correspondence, Editorials and Contributed Articles can not fail to add to The Presbyterian's already wide circulation and greatly extend its influence for good. "Knoxonian's" racy and able article, published every week, is alone worth the yearly subscription, which, notwithstanding the increase in size, remains at its old price, $2.00 per annum. The offer of a "Peerless" Bible as a premium to the getters up of a club, should be the means of enlisting a host of willing workers all over the country. Send to The Presbyterian Printing and Publishing Co., 5 Jordon St. Toronto, for free specimen copy and circular.

Shiloh's catarrh remedy---a positive cure for catarrh, diptheria and canker-mouth. For sale at the Medical Hall.

The Mount Forest Confederate says it is "the best local paper in this part of the country." It also says that it "has the best appointed book and job printing department outside the cities" and "can produce the finest and best work turned out in this section of country." Twice among its locals the announcement appears that "the Confed. speaks right out in meeting, and doesn't consult anybody as to what it shall say when giving advice, and don't you forget it gentlemen!" Modesty is not a component of Mr. Benner's nature, judging by the above. However, as no one could recognize the truth of these statements by observation, the editor is probably justifiable in his attempt to chuck something into the heads of his readers by force that otherwise could find no lodgement there. We do not know who Mr. Benner is, but have heard of a man just like him in ancient mythology. He was a giant and had but one bleary eye set in the centre of his forehead. A little man with a red hot poker put out his eye and despatched him. Don't be a giant with one eye, Bro. Benner.

He Wouldn't be Baptized.

The other day while visiting the neighboring burg of Markdale we heard of a funny incident which happened in that vicinity some time ago. A certain father had neglected having his boy baptized in babyhood, and becoming oppressed with a sense of his negligence in that respect as the youngster advanced in years and had reached ten summers, he concluded to put it off no longer. Accordingly preparations were made to have the thing done in proper style. A few neighbors and the minister were invited without consulting the youth, and on the day appointed guests arrived and the boy was made acquainted with the grave ordeal he was expected to undergo. He did not say anything but thought a great deal. When the curtain was about to rise the hero was called but he was not on hand. He had "sneaked." One of the family who was searching for the culprit just caught one glimpse of him in the back field as he was making a bee line for the bush. His feet were shoveling snow at a fearful rate. It could not be learned whether he is yet baptised or not.

Ravenna Farmer's Institute.

A meeting of the Centre Grey Farmer's Institute was held at Ravenna Feb. 22nd. The weather being very stormy, the meeting was not as large as other meetings of the Institute held in this district, but on the whole was good, and a live interest was taken in the cause by those present.

Andrew Shore, Esq., was elected chairman. Rev. Paul Flinn acted as secretary. The President, Mr. Thos. Kells, opened the meeting by stating the object in view, and also submitted in writing a report of the work the Institute has been doing during the last two months, which was very satisfactory. He also gave a brief report of the business transacted at the Central Farmer's Institute meeting, held in the city of Toronto on the 5th, 6th, and 7th inst. He said the attendance was too large, and thought that one delegate from each electoral district was quite sufficient. Business would be done better by 83 than by 166 delegates. By reducing the number to one half there would be a saving of $750. The money thus saved could be used to good advantages by the Institutes. The President also read a letter from our worthy member, Dr. Sproule, requesting the Secretary of the Institute to send to him the names and post offices of the different members of the Institute, and he, through Prof. Saunders, of the Experimental Farm, Ottawa, would send reports of new varieties of seed grain, and other seeds. Mr. Shore next addressed the meeting, strongly urging the necessity of farmers being united for the purpose of meeting together, consulting each other, and hearing papers read on scientific and practical agriculture, thereby learning better methods of working the soil, managing the stock, and to be in a position to seek fair play at the hands of our legislatures.

Neil McColman, Esq., ex M.P.P., delivered a very excellent address on Manitoba, the Northwest and the province of Ontario. While he spoke very highly of the Northwest as a great agricultural country, especially for wheat and other grains, and likewise cattle, he said notwithstanding this, Ontario was the province of the Dominion. Mr. J. B. Marsh next took the floor, and thought that as the Americans did not need our produce, and were preparing to do without it altogether, we should seek a market in England for our beef, lambs, and horses. He likewise stated the great importance of raising that class of stock and grain best suited for the British market. He said in barley the two rowed was the best. Mr. Marsh deals in cattle, and ships to the Old Country. He was there twice the past season, and says farmers have nothing to fear, but on the contrary will be well rewarded by producing a suitable class of stock and grain for the British market.

Mr. William Walter thought organization on the part of farmers necessary by meeting together for consultation they would be well able to attend to their own business.

Mr. John Irwin, second dept. reeve of the township of Collingwood, said he would not object to annexing the U. S. to Canada. He said farmers have been humbugged in the past by following party lines too closely, and was prepared to give credit to any government whose legislation was in the interests of the country as a whole especially the farmers institute. Mr. James Strachan delivered a short but eloquent address. The meeting then adjourned to meet at 7 o'clock p.m.

EVENING MEETING

A sol pro rammie was rendered. The choir, under the able leadership of Mr. Silas Hallett, gave a good account of themselves by rendering music in their usual excellent style. Mr. Fred Marsh spoke effectually on the importance of the agricultural college. Messrs. Irwin, Kells, McColman and Walker gave interesting addresses on various subjects of agricultural pursuits. Mr. James Strachan gave a thrilling recitation. Mr. W. F. Hewgill gave a reading. It was resolved that the next annual meeting of Centre Grey Farmers' Institute would be held at Ravenna. The membership was increased to 110. Thus ended a very successful meeting, notwithstanding that some of the prominent men who were to read papers and many others were prevented by the storm from attending. We might just add that the Institute was heartily welcomed to Collingwood township, and judging from the interest already taken Collingwood will give a good account of itself in the future.

ICE CREAM AND HEAVEN.

A Trance Prodigy Eats the One and Thinks She is in the Other.

A Harrisburg, Pa., despatch says: Hundreds of people are still flocking to the residence of John Parthemore, at Steelton, where little Lillie Bodmer is lying in what is denominated a religious trance. Her form is rigid. She constantly stares upward and claims to be in communication with God. Lillie is said to have been converted on the 1st inst. at a revival at Steelton. Her religious fervor was followed by a calm, which was succeeded by the trance. The physicians are unable to prescribe any treatment, and the only things she has eaten since her confinement are oranges and ice cream. She seems to believe herself in heaven and almost constantly speaks of Christ. She recognizes no one by name. While talking of objects which she claims to see in the spirit world she will stop suddenly, her form will become rigid, her eyeballs roll upward and remain fixed, and her hands and her arms continue stiff in whatever position they happen to be when she sinks into the trance. She was asked by Rev. Mr. Keefer where she had been, and she replied:

"Oh! I have been flying around with Jesus. We have been to High Spire, Highland, Harrisburg and Steelton. Oh! we have been all around."

She never received any education, a fact to be noticed in her formation of sentences. Upon returning to consciousness from one of her trances, during which she had wept, she was asked what made her cry. Her answer was, "Oh! I was praying for my relatives."

When any one speaks to her she does not look at them, but feels for their hands and takes them in hers. She has never read the Bible; yet whenever she is asked by any one who holds her hands about certain Biblical doctrines she will answer in an intelligent manner. When asked a question she cannot answer she says, "Wait, I'll ask Jesus."

Then she turns her head to the wall, her lips move, and a little later she gives the correct answer. She speaks of the Lord with perfect freedom and assurance, and is extremely affectionate with those who talk to her. The girl never gets any spasms, is not hysterical and does not grow weak. She is wholly without pain.

Said the Rev. Mr. Keefer, her pastor—"It is a wonderful case, but it is no mental aberration. I am not a Spiritualist in any sense of the word, but I do believe that this girl has direct communication with the spirit world. She is with them; she speaks to them; she is a direct manifestation of the divine power. I could give you columns of strange things that she has told about people whom she never knew. She has described heaven, and she does not believe she is on earth. It is a great mystery, indeed."

Other doctors speak from a purely medical point of view, and say that the girl's mind is unbalanced.

IN A BAD BOX.

A Railway Car Takes Fire and the Passengers have an Exciting Time.

A Paris cable says: A very startling accident occurred at daybreak yesterday to the express train Le Rapids coming from Nice to Paris. As the train reached a point about five miles south of Dijon, passengers in the new carriage, in which the compartments communicate with each other, noticed a strong smell of something burning. The carriage was heated, not with the usual hot water foot-warmers, but with a system of hot-air currents that permeated under the floor of the compartments. One passenger, at ten minutes past 6, noticed that flames were darting up from the floor. The night had been terribly cold, and the wind had blown the gas out. The passengers pulled at the knob of the alarm signal, but the signal did not work, it being jammed or frozen. There were twelve persons in the carriage. The flames were increasing with frightful rapidity. The floor of the train was one mass of glowing embers. The passengers jumped upon the seats and shrieked for the guard. The train began to slow up for the station of Dijon. The guard noticed the smoke and at once stopped the train. The flames were already curling about the seats and cushions. The passengers at once jumped out of the carriage, some of them leaving their luggage behind them. The rest of the train went on to Dijon for assistance, leaving the passengers and a few employees in a shed near the track, where the carriage soon became a bonfire and was completely destroyed, together with a portion of the passengers' hand-bags.

Her Longest Sleep Approaching.

An Attica, N. Y., telegram says: Mrs. Emma Althouse, who awoke on February 6th from a 35 days' trance, is in a precarious condition and can live only a few days longer, according to the opinion of local physicians. On coming out of her long trance she partook of some nourishment and then went to sleep again, remaining unconscious for a day. She seemed very sleepy and artificial means were tried to keep her awake when she was aroused from this nap, but she had several short sleeps. She is now awake and has been so for four days, but her condition is extremely pitiful. She is unable to move and her efforts to whisper to her sisters are unavailing. Efforts to feed her even liquid food must now be given up, for a drop of water or warm milk sets her to coughing in a feeble, painful way that seems likely to result fatally at any moment. These attempts at nourishing the sleeping woman have been followed by fainting fits, lasting 10 or 15 minutes.

ONTARIO LEGISLATURE.

The following Bills were introduced and read the first time:

Mr. French—Respecting actions at law.

Mr. Fraser—To amend the Ontario Shop Regulation Act.

Mr. McAndrews—To amend the Act respecting mortgages and sales of personal property.

Mr. Conmee—Respecting the town of Port Arthur.

The Bill respecting voters' lists (Mr. Fraser) was again considered in Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of receiving some verbal amendments.

Mr. Meredith wished the Bill amended so that voters who were challenged and summoned to attend before the County Court should not be struck off the lists unless the Judge had reasonable ground for thinking that their votes were open to question. Under the present law voters were summoned by wholesale, and often advised not to attend, so that their names might be struck off.

Mr. Gibson (Huron) said the persons who did not attend had, as a rule, no right to vote.

Mr. Fraser said that it was almost invariable that in cases where persons could not attend the gentlemen on their side were always ready to show that their names should not be struck off. He proposed as an amendment that, if objections to voters' names appeared vexatious or frivolous to the judge, he might order appellant to pay the costs before proceeding.

This amendment was carried.

Mr. Meredith asked the hon. member for North Middlesex when his Bill respecting the women's franchise would be brought up for a second reading.

Mr. Waters—The week after next.

Mr. Ingram's Bill to amend the Assessment Act by making it clear that the Legislature intended to exempt incomes to the amount of $700 was read the second time.

The following Bills were introduced and read a first time:

Mr. Bronson—To enable the city of Ottawa to issue debentures for the building of water works.

Mr. Smith—To confirm the title of the County of York to the York toll roads.

Mr. Whitney—To amend the Ditches and Water Courses Act; also to amend the Election Act; also to amend the Act respecting seduction.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton)—Respecting the Pharmacy Act.

Mr. Meredith—Respecting the London Street Railway Company; also, to authorize the Synod of the Diocese of Huron to sell certain lands; also, to amend the Ontario Insurance Act; also, to amend the Ontario Judicature Act; also, to amend the Act respecting building societies; also, to amend the Act respecting arbitrations.

Mr. Marter—Respecting a by-law of the town of Gravenhurst.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton) brought down the report of the Minister of Education for 1888 and the public accounts for 1888; also the report of the Niagara Falls Park Commissioners.

Mr. Ross (Huron) said the Estimates would be ready by Wednesday, and he hoped to make his financial statement on Thursday.

On the order for the third reading of the Bill respecting voters' lists (Mr. Fraser),

Mr. Meredith moved an amendment in the line of his amendment which was proposed in Committee of the Whole and defeated, to the effect that the judge is not to strike off the name of a person from the voters' lists unless there is reasonable ground for the belief that the right of such person to vote is fairly open to question.

Mr. Fraser said the law as it stood had been found to work well both in Ontario and the Dominion. The county judge would not strike off a name merely for non-attendance if it were shown that such name ought to be on the voters' lists. The amendment would lead to numerous evils.

Mr. French favored the amendment.

Mr. Hudson said that in the township of Hungerford 63 names were attested against in one polling division and subpœnaed. Some of the men denounced were old residents. Nothing was lost, however, in these cases, as they were defended.

The House divided and the amendment was lost.

YEAS—Messrs. Biggar, Blyth, Clancey, Clarke, E. F. (Toronto), Clarke, H. E. (Toronto), Craig, Creighton, Cruess, Fell, French, Hammell, Hess, Hudson, Ingram, Kerns, Lees, Marter, Meacham, Meredith, Metcalf, Miller, Monk, Morgan, Ostrom, Preston, Rorke, Smith (Frontenac), Stewart, Tooley, Whitney, Willoughby, Wood (Hastings), Wylie—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Allan, Armstrong, Balfour, Ballantyne, Blezard, Bronson, Caldwell, Chisholm, Clarke (Wellington), Conmee, Dack, Dance, Davis, Drury, Ferguson, Field, Fraser, Freeman, Gardiner, Gibson (Hamilton), Gibson (Huron), Gilmour, Gould, Graham, Harcourt, Hardy, Lees, Lyon, McKay, McMahon, Mack, Master, Morin, Mowat, Murray, O'Connor, Pacaud, Phelps, Rayside, Ross (Huron), Ross (Middlesex), Smith (York), Snider, Sprague, Stratton, Waters, Wood (Brant)—47.

The Bill then passed its third reading.

Mr. Fraser moved that 3,000 copies of the list be printed and distributed among the members.—Carried.

The House went into committee of the whole on Mr. Fraser's Bill to amend the Workman's Compensation for Injuries Act, Mr. Harcourt in the chair.

Mr. Meredith opposed clause 13 on the ground that it would be better to have the clause relating to notice thrown out altogether.

Mr. Fraser explained that although the Act was for the purpose of protecting the workingmen, yet it would be as well to protect the employer to a certain extent also.

Mr. Hudson wanted to know if the Act applied to threshing machines, sawing machines and cheese factories.

Mr. Fraser said it did, and added that although a number of actions had been tried under the English Act, in most cases the compensation recovered was not excessive.

The committee rose and reported the Bill.

The Bill to amend the Ontario Factories Act was passed through Committee of the Whole without amendment.

Mr. Wood (Brant) asked if it is the intention of the Government during the present session to take any steps towards granting the prayer of the petition of certain chiefs of the Six Nation Indians respecting the practice of medicine.

Mr. Mowat said he did not quite understand how far the petition asked for relief, but would be glad to confer with his hon. friend on the subject.

The following Bills were introduced and read the first time:

Mr. Bronson—To amend the Act respecting assignments, etc., by insolvent persons; also to amend the Municipal Act; also to amend the Act for the protection of game and fur-bearing animals.

Mr. Whitney—To amend the Act respecting mortgages and sale of personal property.

Mr. Dryden—To amend the Act imposing taxes on dogs for the protection of sheep.

The following Bills were introduced and read the first time:

Mr. Mowat—Respecting the limited liabilities of incorporated companies; also respecting oaths under the Manhood Suffrage Act; also respecting certain matters under the Land Titles Act; also respecting registry offices.

Mr. Gibson (Huron), in moving for a return of copies of all correspondence relating to the Land Improvement Fund between the Governments of Ontario and Quebec, said many townships in his constituency were waiting the payment of these moneys from the fund, and as they had waited thirty years for a settlement, he suggested that a suit be brought against the Dominion Government so as to expedite affairs.

Mr. Mowat said it was a debateable question whether these moneys belonged to the Province. There had been no authoritative decision on this point. A suit would be a good way to bring about a decision, and one could be instituted against the Dominion, which would in that case represent Quebec. Until the right of the Province to the fund was established, the Government could not make any advances to the municipalities.

Mr. Meredith said the delay was a very serious one, and if the Government had paid as much attention to this matter as they had to the dry husks of the Inter-Provincial resolutions, more practical benefit would have been derived. Had the compact then entered into between the two Provinces already been broken? The twain had then been locked in each other's arms in unity, yet, although so much money had been expended in bringing about such cordial relations, Ontario still could not get her rights from Quebec.

Mr. O'Connor thought the Government should bring this matter to an issue. The matter was one of vital importance to the people of Western Ontario.

Mr. Ross (Huron) said the Government had been very urgent in pressing the claims of the municipalities. So far as Ontario was concerned the Government had always carried out the agreement with the settlers.

Mr. Creighton also expressed the hope that the matter would be pressed by the Government.

Mr. Blyth complained bitterly of the delay in settling with the municipalities.

The motion was adopted.

On the order for the second reading of the Bill to amend the Assessment Act (Mr. O'Connor),

Mr. Meredith pointed out that the objection to the Bill, which gave the smaller municipalities power to conduct their own sale of land for taxes, was that they had no means for preserving the evidences of title like the county towns.

Mr. Ross (Huron) thought that many evils would result from the practice recommended by the Bill. Under the present system there was more competition in the sales of lands held by the County Treasurer.

Mr. Balfour said that the present system enabled speculators to get rich at the expense of the people. The lands were often advertised in some obscure paper; the people from the locality concerned often knew nothing about it, and did not attend. The speculators attended, clubbed together, and bought it at their own prices.

Mr. Wood supported the Act. He agreed with Mr. Balfour that the sales should be held in the townships. In his township it would be almost impossible for people living in the outlying municipalities to attend these sales owing to the expense of travel.

Mr. Dack supported the Bill.

Mr. Phelps said he represented a county where there was more land sold in this way than in any other county in Ontario. Many hardships were entailed under the present Act.

The Bill was read a second time and referred to the Municipal Committee.

Mr. Waters moved the second reading of the Bill for the abolition of assessment on personal property.

Mr. Fraser suggested that all the Bills dealing with the vital question of assessment be taken up together one day, and passed upon by the House before being referred to the Municipal Committee.

Mr. Meredith agreed with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Waters agreed to withdraw the motion for the second reading.

Mr. Bishop moved the second reading of the Bill to amend the Act respecting insurance companies. The Bill proposed to permit fire insurance companies to contract for any term not exceeding five years.

Mr. Gibson (Huron) supported the Bill, but suggested that the terms should be three and five years, so as not to confuse the inspector.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton) said that the Bill was opposed by insurance companies and associations. It was desirable that there should be uniformity in the term of insurance.

The Bill was read the second time.

The following Bills were read the second time:

To amend the Act respecting the establishment of municipal institutions in the Districts of Algoma, Muskoka, Parry Sound, Manitoulin, Nipissing, Thunder Bay and Rainy River—Mr. Lyon.

To amend the Municipal Act—Mr. Ferguson.

To amend the Municipal Act—Mr. O'Connor.

Templar Union.

Bro. Thomas Lawless, Grand Secretary of the Independent Order of Good Templars, has returned from London. In conversation he stated that the executives of the Royal Templars and the Independent Order devoted several hours to a discussion of the question of Union, for a long time almost hopeless of results. Finally the following basis of union, moved by Bro. Thos. Lawless and seconded by Dr. Oronhyatekha was adopted by a vote of 8 to 4:

First—That the first or Templar degree of the I. O. G. T. and the first or Royal degree of the R. T. of T. be united for the prosecution of temperance missionary work, adopting the name, ritual and organic form of the Good Templars.

Second—That the benefit department of the I. O. G. T. be united with the Select degree of the Royal Templars, adopting the name, ritual and methods of that body as far as practicable.

Third—That the Knight Templars of Temperance be a part of the united body, and preserve so far as possible the present name, form and ceremonies.

Fourth—That membership in the I. O. G. T. be essential to admission to and continuance of membership in the second and third bodies.

Fifth—That each of the organizations retain its own officers and continue to be governed by its own laws.

Sixth—That the Dominion Council of the R. T. of T. shall be the supreme governing body of the benefit and knight degrees and occupy the position of a Worthy Grand Lodge.

All the I. O. G. T. representatives and three of the eight R. T. of T. voted for the motion. W. W. Buchanan presided.

Letting Bad Enough Alone.

Exceedingly Long Patient—"I say, doctor, are you going to put that mustard plaster on my feet to draw the pain from my head?"

Doctor—"Yes. Why?"

Exceedingly Long Patient—"Well, I bject. I'd rather have it where it is than rawn down through six feet and five inches of new territory."

Mr. Cameron, train-master at Rat Portage, has been appointed assistant superintendent of the Moosejaw division of the Canadian Pacific.

The Devil.

Men don't believe in the devil now as their fathers used to do
They've forced the door of the broadest creed to let his majesty through;
There isn't a print of his cloven foot or a fiery dart from his brow
To be found in earth or air to-day, for the world has voted so.
But who is mixing the fatal draught that palsies heart and brain,
And loads the earth of each passing year with ten hundred thousand slain?
Who blights the bloom of the land to-day with the fiery breath of hell,
If the devil isn't and never was? Won't somebody rise and tell?
Who dogs the steps of the toiling saint, and digs
the pits for his feet?
Who sows the tares in the field of time whenever God sows His wheat?
The devil is voted not to be, and of course the thing is true;
But who is doing the kind of work the devil alone should do?
We are told he is not going about as a roaring lion now;
But whom shall we hold responsible for the everlasting row
To be heard in home, in church, in state, to the earth's remotest bound,
If the devil, by a unanimous vote, is nowhere to be found?
Won't somebody step to the front forthwith and make his bow and show
How the fraud and the crimes of the day spring up, for surely we want to know?
The devil was fairly voted out, and of course the devil is gone,
But simple people would like to know who carries his business on.

—Atlanta Journal.

The Conqueror Conquered.

In southern archipelagoes he'd fought the bloody cannibal;
He'd skinned and tanned the crocodile and found him very tanable;
Not a word of fear he'd uttered, not a word and not a syllable,
When he killed the Bengal tiger, and he found him very killable.

He claimed his strength was very great, for bears and lions suitable;
He used to boot the grizzly bear, and found him
very bootable;
He claimed in killing monstrous snakes that he was very capable,
No boa-constrictor could escape, for he was unescapable.

In fighting hippopotami he said he was invincible,
No jaguar could make him wince, because he wasn't wincable;
He made the ramping elephant no longer recognizable,
And pulverized the roaring bull, and found him
pulverizable

Just then his wife came in and said, "I'd think it quite commendable,
If you'd come and 'tend the baby; and you'll find him very tendable."
The way she took him by the ear will make this poem readable;
She pulled him out and led him home, and found him very leadable.

THE TYPEWRITER GIRL.

She May Be Slow, But She Generally Comprehends the Situation.

The typewriter girl may sometimes be a little slow, but generally comprehends the situation with neatness and despatch. The Chicago News tells this story:

"Darling Bessie," said Mr. Hoover to his lady typewriter, "will you marry me? Since you have come like a gleam of sunshine to gladden my existence I have lived in a radiant light of your ethereal presence and passionately—"

"Please speak a little slower, Mr. Hoover," said the fair typewriter, interrupting him, while her fingers continued to fly over the keys of her machine. "'Ethereal—presence—passionately.' Now I am ready to proceed."

"Great Scott! Miss Caramel," exclaimed her employer, "you are not taking down my offer of marriage on that infernal typewriter, are you?"

"A proposal," shrieked Miss Caramel. "Why, so it is. I didn't notice. I thought you were dictating. Forgive me, dear William. I am yours. And now, since I have made this foolish blunder, please sign this paper and I will keep it as a memento."

The marriage took place according to contract.

Huxley is a Medium.

Prof. Huxley tells the world, through the Pall Mall Gazette, what he knows about spiritism. He visited a talented American woman who was a medium, and at first was much impressed with the facility with which she rapped out messages. Summoning his proverbial skepticism to his aid, he redoubled his vigilance, and soon made up his mind that the rapping was done by means of the toe. By patient cultivation of the second toe of each foot, he soon had two light fantastic toes of his own, and soon became a sort of bright rapper himself, and while standing with a group of persons in a parlor had no difficulty in making them believe that the sounds proceeded from all parts of the room. His experience is curiously in line with the revelations made by Miss Fox and Mr. Bishop.

A Horrifying Blunder.

Mrs. De Pink—"Oh! Oh! Oh! I shall go distracted."

Mr. De Pink (springing to her side)—"Merciful heavens! What has happened?"

"The washerwoman has made a mistake and sent me one of Mrs. Westend's lace handkerchiefs."

"Well, what of it?"

"What of it? What of it? Oh you—you——Why, Mrs. Westend must have received my miserably cheap, imitation lace handkerchief, and it has my name on it."

No Painful Contrasts.

Rosalie—"Did you have a nice time at Mrs. Ferguson's the other evening?"

Mabel—"Oh, delightful! But such awfully homely girls as there were there."

Rosalie—"So Mr. Summerly was telling me; he said there wasn't a decent-looking one in the room."

He Had Been.

They were talking about confidence men and relating their experiences, when one of the group turned to the major and asked

"Major, were you ever confidenced?"

"I was," he promptly replied.

"Where?"

"In Chicago."

"When?"

"When I married my second wife."

He Wanted No Credit.

Clerk (calling boy)—Cash!

Countryman—Great turnips, can't you give me time to get my pocketbook out? I don't want no credit? I don't! I am going to pay you cash as soon as I can get at it!

In Furrin' Parts.

Lady—I want a lined cloak, if you please.

Furrier—Yes, Madam. What fur?

Lady—How stupid! Why, to keep me warm, of course.

DOMINION PARLIAMENT.

Mr. Bernard, the newly-elected member for Cariboo, was introduced and took his seat.

Sir Hector Langevin presented the annual report of the Department of State.

Mr. Ellis introduced a Bill to authorize the assessment of the salaries on incomes of persons in the service of Canada. He explained that the object of the Bill was to provide that in places where assessments were levied upon salaries or incomes for municipal or school purposes, the law shall include civil servants.

The Bill was read a first time.

Mr. Bowell, in answer to an inquiry from Mr. Choquette, said that the cost of the preparation of the electoral lists up to the time when the Government Printing Bureau assumed control was $414,574; and the cost since that time had been $21,502. The value of the plant acquired in the bureau was $63,849.

Sir Adolphe Caron, in answer to an inquiry from Mr. Platt, said the Government had agreed to purchase a house in Kingston for the use of the Commandant of the Royal Military College. The price to be paid was $12,500. The house was distant about 2,000 yards from the college.

Mr. Haggart, in answer to an inquiry from Mr. Therien, said it was not the intention of the Government to reduce the rate of postage on letters.

Mr. Bain (Wentworth), in moving for returns respecting the condition and ownership of the Dundas & Waterloo road, called attention to the injury which is being done to traffic in his constituency through the road not being kept in a proper condition, owing to the Government not giving the owner authority to put in checkgates.

Sir Hector Langevin replied that the Government were at present having the ownership investigated, and when that point was settled there would be no more cause for complaint.

Mr. Mulock moved that the House do resolve itself into a committee of the whole to consider the following resolution: That it is expedient to remove the duty on artificial fertilizers and to place them on the free list. He said that under the present duty of 20 per cent. the farmers of Canada were prevented from using artificial fertilizers. When in 1887 it was proposed by the Government to change the duty to a specific one, it was proposed that fertilizers should be placed on the free list. The result was that the Minister of Finance withdrew his motion, and the duty remained the same. The time had now arrived when it was the duty of the House to consider whether it was not in the interests of the Canadian farmer that this tax should be removed. It was a direct burden upon the farmer, and was wholly indefensible as a matter of political economy.

The following Bills were introduced:

A Bill to incorporate the Assets & Debenture Company of Canada—Mr. Edgar.

A Bill to incorporate the Ottawa & Montreal Boom Company—Mr. Girouard.

A Bill to incorporate the Dominion Life Assurance Company—Mr. Trow.

A Bill to incorporate the Assiniboine & Edmonton Railway—Mr. Dawson.

A Bill amending the Act incorporating the Boiler Inspection Insurance Companies of Canada—Mr. Brown.

On motion by Mr. Foster that the House go into Committee of Supply,

Mr. Mills (Bothwell) drew attention to the fact that the Minister of Finance, in laying the estimates before the House, had not moved that they be referred to the Committee of Supply.

The Speaker said the motion had been entered in the votes and proceedings by the Clerk, pro forma, and hoped the House would adhere to the rules more strictly in future.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of Supply.

On the item for Customs,

Mr. Charlton referred to the large number of Customs officials who receive large sums from fines from seizures in addition to their salaries. The system of allowing officers of the department to participate in the profits from seizures was, he believed, a vicious one, and one calculated to disturb trade and inflict great hardship on importers.

Mr. Ferguson (Welland) concurred entirely in the remarks of the last speaker. In his own county Customs officers had pocketed as high as $1,100 in a year from seizures, and subjected in many cases merchants to the inconvenience of a search where there was not the slightest ground for suspicion.

On the items for the Post-office Department,

Mr. Mitchell inquired whether or not the Government intended to reduce the rate of postage to two cents for the half ounce?

Mr. Haggart said such a change was not at present contemplated.

Mr. Bain inquired if the Government had considered the feasibility of increasing the weight of letters to be carried for three cents from half an ounce to one ounce?

Mr. Haggart said he intended bringing in a Bill during the present session, involving a number of changes in Post-office regulations, of which that mentioned by the hon. gentleman would be one.

Mr. Burdett suggested that insufficiently prepaid letters, where the name of the sender appears on the envelope, should be returned for full postage instead of being sent to the dead letter office.

Mr. Haggart said instructions to this effect had already been issued to most of the city postmasters.

The item passed.

Sir John Thompson, in answer to inquiries from Mr. Barron, said the Jesuits' Estates Bill had been before the Government for consideration, and the Minister of Justice had on the 16th ult. reported to His Excellency recommending that this Act, along with 112 others passed by the Quebec Legislature at the same session, should go into operation. The report was approved on the 19th ult., and the result was at once communicated to the Government of Quebec. The Acts passed by the Legislature of Quebec were received by the Secretary of State on August 8th last.

Sir Hector Langevin, in answer to an inquiry from Mr. Burdett, said he would have to wait until the supplementary estimates came down, when he would learn whether or not the Government intended granting any sum to aid in the construction of a drill shed at Belleville.

Mr. Denison, in moving for a select committee to inquire into the desirability of the Government acquiring all electric telegraph lines in Canada, said he had laid the matter fully before the House last session, and would briefly renew his argument in favor of it. He had pointed out on that occasion that nearly every country in the world except Canada and the United States had acquired the telegraph lines. In France, Austria, Germany, Switzerland and nearly all over Europe the telegraph lines were assumed by the respective Governments more than twenty years ago. A young country like Canada should not be behind the world, and it was time we were taking some steps to control the lines in our country. No doubt it would involve a large outlay of money, but he did not see why the telegraph lines should not be managed as well by the Government as by private companies. Already the Government owned lines in the Northwest Territory and Eastern Provinces. These lines were built in sparsely settled districts, where there were no private lines. If it was a good thing for the Government to own such unproductive lines, it would be a much better investment to control those which pass through thickly populated districts. The Government could borrow money at a lower rate of interest than could a private company, and would no doubt receive sufficient revenue to repay the investment. It was a strange thing that the leading lines of the Dominion should be controlled by a person living outside of Canada, who was thus able to form, or apparently form, public opinion in this country. In support of this he instanced Mr. Wiman's despatch to the Canadian press. This showed that a dangerous power was placed in the hands of a foreign company. He thought the time was drawing near when the Government should be in a position to assume the control of the telegraph lines.

Sir Hector Langevin replied that the time had not yet come for the Government to purchase the telegraph lines. Besides the telegraph companies there were railways possessing lines, and he hardly thought they could be taken over. The assumption of lines would require a very large sum, much larger than people were at present willing to invest in that direction. The hon. gentleman had said these lines would return a good revenue, but it was well known that large undertakings in the hands of a private corporation always gave a better revenue than when in the hands of the Government. Besides, it was well known that at that time politics ran high in this country. He feared that if the Government worked the lines the Opposition would have very little confidence in the secrecy of their election despatches. He asked the member for West Toronto to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Denison withdrew his motion.

Mr. Jamieson moved that, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to prohibit the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors, except for sacramental, medicinal, scientific and mechanical purposes. That the enforcement of such prohibition and such manufacture, importation and sale as may be allowed shall be by the Dominion Government through specially appointed officers. He quoted statistics to prove that there had been a decrease of crime under the Canada Temperance Act. If local option had had a salutary effect, he contended that general prohibition would be equally, if not more, satisfactory. The morals of the people and the happiness of the people would both be promoted by prohibition. As he was exceedingly anxious to reach a division, he curtailed his remarks and trusted the resolution would receive a much larger support than formerly.

Mr. Wood (Brockville) moved in amendment that all the words after the word "purposes" be omitted, and the following substituted: "When the public sentiment of the country is ripe for the reception and enforcement of such a measure of prohibition."

Mr. Taylor moved in amendment to the amendment that all the words after the word "purposes" be struck out, and the following substituted: "If it be found on the vote of the qualified electors of the Dominion having first been taken that the majority thereof are in favor of a prohibitory law, which shall also make full provision for compensating those engaged in the manufacture of such liquor."

Mr. Fisher said there might be good grounds for asking that prohibition be submitted to the people apart from every other question. He could not accept the amendment to the amendment, however, because it asserted the principle of compensation. He did not think the adoption of the amendment would be any aid to the temperance cause. He thought that the true friends of prohibition would support the original resolution.

Mr. Mitchell moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Landerkin moved, That whereas distillers are allowed a rebate of duty upon corn imported for use in the manufacture of spirits for export, it is, in the opinion of this House, but just and right that farmers and stock raisers, who import corn to feed cattle or other stock for export, should also receive a similar rebate. He held this was a matter of justice to the farmers, who were suffering from the present discrimination against them.

BEARDS LONG AGO.

A Point Made to Favor the Wearer Who Encountered an Enemy.

Our Saxon ancestors delighted in wearing long, forked beards; the Normans, on the contrary, at the period of the conquest, not only shaved their chins but also the back of their heads. They had not, however, been long established in England before they permitted their beards to grow to extravagant dimensions. Long beards were also in fashion in the reign of Richard I., and continued so until the time of Henry IV., after whose reign they grew fine by degrees and beautifully less, until a beard was as rare as the dodo. But the reformation came to the rescue of the beard and in this way: After the separation of the Greek and Latin churches the practice of shaving became a religious duty among the Roman ecclesiastics, by way of opposition to the Greeks, who to this day have continued to pay reverence to a well clad chin and are greatly shocked by the beardless images of saints in the Latin churches. The shaving of the chin by the clergy was imperatively commanded by various statutes in the Romish church. By the monastic laws the lay monks were commanded to let their beards grow and only the priests to shave; and a writer previous to the reformation complains that the manners of the clergy had become so corrupt that they could not be distinguished from the laity by their actions, but only by their lack of beards. Consequently the early reformers suffered their beards to grow to distinguish them from the adherents to Rome; and the reformation becoming general in England, the beard by this means came into fashion.

As to the shapes of the beard worn by our forefathers, they seem to have been of infinite variety. At a period when almost all men wore swords and those weapons were frequently drawn to decide very trifling quarrels, a beard cut to look terrible to an enemy was probably no small advantage to the wearer.—London Standard.

Temperance Notes.

From the Philadelphia Times we learn that in all the lithographic establishments of the country where the work is mainly done by German workingmen, a stipulation requires the proprietors to furnish beer as a part of the employees' wages. In the mammoth lithographic department of Judge in New York city, where 600 men are employed, each one receives under the terms of contract with his employer three pints of beer a day, more than seven barrels being consumed in the department daily.

"I dread the white man's drink more than all the arrows of the Matabele," is the sentiment of a South African Chief; and the Emir of Bokhara, in his treaty with the Russians, has set us a notable example, for whilst he accords free introduction of all other Russian commerce, he strictly prohibits intoxicating liquors. Some painful figures have just been published about the ravages of drink in Belgium, and these are very much traced to the absence of proper licensing laws, and to the facility with which public-houses can in that kingdom be kept open until 2 o'clock in the morning, or, for the matter of that, all the night through. The condition of affairs is such that neither political party dare touch it—it would lose them an election. The remedy will have to be sought in a patriotic union of all parties.—The Rock.

"The Economic Argument" for prohibition is forcibly presented by the Rev. J. C. Fernald in last week's Voice. We make the following quotation: "Three-fourths of the 8,000 saloons in New York city are kept by foreigners. The saloons of the United States average a yearly income of $4,500 each. At this rate the foreigners' three-fourths of New York's saloons take in $27,000,000 every year. It ought not to be a very hard matter to convince the level-headed merchants of the metropolis that it does not pay to let 6,000 foreigners levy an annual tribute of $27,000,000 upon the city. They will see it quickly enough if they can be got to think about it. As yet very little has been done to lead them to consider the temperance question upon the commercial side. They have looked upon it as a 'moral issue' which 'practical men' were too busy to attend to." "The temperance battle of the near future must be fought on the commercial and economic ground."

The Light of Home.

A cheerful, healthy woman is the light of home, but through over-exertion in her efforts to minister to the happiness of the household, her health is often impaired or weakness, or displacement brought on, making life miserable, and clouding an otherwise happy home with gloom. The thoughtful and tender husband, in such cases, should be intelligent enough to perceive the cause of such gloom and suffering, relieve the faithful wife from drudgery, and furnish her with that best of friends to women, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, now recognized and used in thousands of homes as a certain cure for all those delicate afflictions peculiar to the female sex. "Favorite Prescription" is the only medicine for women, sold by druggist, under a positive guarantee from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle-wrapper, and faithfully carried out for many years.

The Marriage is Off.

GOLD FOR EVERYBODY.

The Latest Swindle Was in Boston and Is Here Described.

The city of Boston is just now being treated to a return to the days of alchemy more wonderful than when Dr. Faustus, surrounded by test tubes and crucibles, was visited by his satanic majesty. There are H. E. Butler and Charles Henry Washburne and others who propose to make all the precious metals out of dirt, and as for jewels, there will hereafter, according to these wizards, be no reason why every woman in the world shouldn't have diamond earrings and other ornaments composed of precious stones. They propose to build a college which shall be a temple to the new science and where experiments can be carried on. They issued a circular or "call to the awakened" to send in their contributions to Butler in order that the gentleman may proceed to build an "esoteric college" on the Pacific coast. This college is to be devoted to soul culture. There will be a colony of esoterics who will be endowed with miraculous powers. Those who invest are to be the possessors of untold millions. The call is issued in pamphlet form and occupies 200 pages. The reader is informed of the existence of a wonderful society called the G. N. K. R., or the "Genii of Nations, Knowledge and Religions." The secrets committed to this society are all to be revealed in Boston, and Butler to be the medium. The principal theosophs of Boston first got the circular and copies were sent through the country to those who were in favor of theosophy. Then Professor Butler quietly waited for contributions. Now the newspapers have got hold of the matter, and the great scheme seems doomed.

Prof. Huxley on the Morals of Health.

Prof. Huxley has predicted that the time will come when it will be a reproach to be sick. When one friend meets another he will as soon ask "Are you honest?" as "Are you well?" for a man will be considered foolish, not to say criminal, who gets sick. Such a state of public feeling will some time be brought about. Certainly it is true that the morals of health are receiving more and more attention. A greatly increasing number of people every year prevent the development of all blood, pulmonary and liver diseases. This is proved by the enormously increased use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, which nips all such ailments in the bud.

A Reasonable Request.

Emily—Dear Charlie, I saw a diamond ring yesterday. It is perfectly heavenly. Can't you buy it for me?

Charles—Perfectly heavenly, is it? Say, Emily, why don't you wish for something earthly?

"Man wants but little here below." This is particularly true of medicine, and he really needs a very small amount, provided it be of the right kind. Dr. Pierce's Pellets fill the bill in respect of size, and are stupendous in point of effectiveness. If you desire immediate relief from headache, "liver complaint," indigestion, and constipation, they will not fail you.

Fasting Extraordinary.

An interesting story is published in the French papers, which, if true, certainly reveals a most extraordinary case. A young lady named Josephine Bedard, belonging to Tingwich, in the Eastern Townships of Quebec, was taken sick in 1881 with an attack of diphtheria, from which she was dangerously ill for some time. She finally recovered, but since then is reported not to have eaten a bite of food, but has lived for 2,550 days entirely on water, having no desire for food of any kind. She is said to be in perfect health.

Last year, notwithstanding the duty, the United States took 99 858 bushels of potatoes from Manitoba alone. Reciprocal trade would be a great boon to the Manitobans, as well as to the people of Ontario and the Lower Provinces.

"We believe that in extent of light-weight raw material collected and carried, Mr. Page holds the lead of any competitor and that his present stock is the largest held by any house in this country."

And the Review says:

"After a most thorough investigation of Mr Page's business as compared with others in same line, we have become fully satisfied that as a specialty, light-weight stock, he is unquestionably the largest dealer in this country, while in superiority of quality he is confessedly at the head."

QUERY: If Mr. Page's business is the largest in its line in the United States, is it not the best possible proof of his ability to pay highest prices? If he did not do so, would he naturally get more Skins than any of his competitors in the same line?

Although that was true in a sense, yet he returned again the following week, having been snow bound in Collingwood. He is now to be found next door to his old stand in Moore's block. This explanation would have been given last week, but as we did not know where he was going to locate we thought better to postpone explanation until this week.

John Miller, of Bentinck, was arrested and lodged in gaol at Owen Sound on an order by the judge, issued on information by Miller's wife. About four years ago Miller was tried at the assizes on a charge of wife murder. He was accused of driving a team of horses over his wife and thus killing her. The defence was that the team became unmanageable and in spite of all Miller's efforts they trampled on the woman and killed her. Miller was acquitted. He then married his present wife, who brought an action for alimony against him, and when he was quietly disposing of his property Mrs. Miller showed her business ability by quietly seizing on his person. Mrs. Miller says her liege lord abused her and took great pleasure in playfully holding her mouth open and running his tongue down her throat.

The Past.

For six years I have labored to establish a living business on the basis of honorable dealing with all—handling reliable goods at fair prices, and endeavoring to give "value received" every time goods are exchanged for money, note or credit. I have been "thrust" into something of success by the genuine support of a large section of "Central Grey" which would not have come if "undeserved."

The Present

Being fully established on the above lines, and having a very complete stock in all regular jewelers' lines, I shall expect and endeavor to still deserve the confidence and support of all past patrons, and will hope to gain new ones as 1889 rolls along.

The Future.

I trust to be able this year to keep my stock even better assorted for customers to select from. Will continue to buy from A 1 firms at closest possible prices, and offer all buyers reliable watches, etc., at "bed rock" prices. A call solicited. Goods and work warranted.

MARKDALE.

DOMINION PARLIAMENT.

Sir John Thompson laid on the table the annual report of the Department of Justice respecting penitentiaries.

Sir John Macdonald presented the report of the Commissioner of Northwest Mounted Police.

The following Bills were read a second time.

To incorporate the Assiniboia, Edmonton and Cypiga Railway Company.

To incorporate the Assets and Debenture Company of Canada.

To incorporate the Dominion Life Assurance Company.

To amend the Act incorporating the Boiler Inspection and Insurance Company of Canada.

To incorporate the Red Dear Valley Railway and Coal Company.

Respecting the Niagara Grand Island Bridge Company.

Mr. Carling, in answer to an inquiry by Sir Richard Cartwright, said that in estimating the population of the Dominion at 4,815,497, the numbers assigned to each Province were as follows: Ontario, 2,154,786; Quebec, 1,479,036; Nova Scotia, 483,277; New Brunswick, 345,292; Manitoba, 152,624; British Columbia, 131,306; Prince Edward Island, 120,176; Territories, 100,000.

The following Bills were introduced and read a first time:

Respecting the Alberta & Athabasca Railway Company—Mr. Davis.

Amending the Act incorporating the London Mutual Fire Insurance Company—Mr. Marshall.

Mr. Purcell introduced a Bill to make provision for the protection of persons employed by contractors engaged in the construction of railways under the Acts passed by the Parliament of Canada. He explained that the object of the Bill was to render the original contractors on railways liable for wages earned by the laborers engaged in the construction of the work. His experience in railway construction had convinced him of the necessity of such a provision in the law in the interest of the laboring classes.

The Bill was read a first time.

Mr. Tupper introduced a Bill to amend the Act respecting the safety of ships. He stated that the Bill was modelled largely on the Bill introduced by his predecessor last session, the chief difference being that it did not contain the provisions of the former Bill respecting the detention of ships at the different ports.

Mr. Tupper, in answer to an inquiry put by Mr. Moncreiff, said it was the intention of the Government to erect a range of lights in the village of Corunna, opposite Stag Island River St. Clair.

Mr. Bowell, in answer to the inquiry of Mr. Eisenhauer, said the Government were considering the question of changing the system of bonding of foreign fish, which had prevailed since Confederation. Petitions of that character had been received.

Mr. Bowell, in answer to inquiries from Mr. Boyle, said the value of our importations from the United States of green fruits, seeds, trees and other articles placed on the free list by Order-in Council, dated April 4th, 1888, from that date until January 1st last, was $831,399. The amount of revenue which would have been collected upon such importations, if they had not been placed upon the free list, was $219,626. The value of such importations from the United States for the corresponding period of the previous year was $498,183. The value of our exports of these articles to the United States from 4th April, 1888, until January 1st last, was $1,486,022, of which apples amounted to $1,315,452, berries $80,000 and trees and seeds $50,000, leaving $40,570 for the smaller fruits.

Mr. Foster, in answer to the inquiry of Mr. Langelier, said no contract had yet been entered into for a line of rapid mail steamers across the Atlantic Ocean, but negotiations had been entered into with that end in view.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the Alberta Railway and Coal Company.

Mr. Trow said the company had a monopoly of the whole coal business of that country. Coal at the mine cost the company $1 a ton, and at Calgary it cost $8. They could well afford to sell coal for $3. He asked that other railways should have running powers on this line.

Mr. Shanley said that the railway had no connection with Calgary.

Mr. Mills suggested that a clause should be inserted in the Bill fixing the maximum charge per mile.

Sir John Thompson said the company would have to submit their tariff to the Railway Committee. All these subjects were dealt with by the Railway Act in such a way that this company would be subject to the Railway Committee.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

The House went into committee on the Bill respecting the Kootenay & Athabasca Railway Company, and reported it without amendment.

Several Bills were advanced a stage.

Mr. Brown, in moving for the second reading of his Bill to make further provision to prevent cruelty to animals, said the main object of the Bill was to prevent the trap shooting of pigeons and small birds, cock fighting, dog fighting, and not only to punish the instigators, but all who attended sport of that debasing character. The Humane Societies of Toronto, Ottawa, London and Hamilton had petitioned for the Bill. Every true sportsman in Canada would support the measure. There was some opposition emanating from some of the gun clubs of Canada. These debasing slaughters were called tournaments; but they were not manly sports. The men went within twenty or forty feet of the defenceless birds and shot them in a heartless manner. Dumb animals were as sensitive to pain as any hon. gentleman. The same sport could be obtained from clay pigeons as from shooting the live bird. The practice of shooting small birds for sport was cruel and barbarous, and was being discountenanced all over the civilized world. The Queen had refused to accept invitations for herself or any of the Royal Family to attend such events. In these pigeon matches the eyes of birds had been put out to increase the sport. There was nothing in the Bill that could not receive the full confidence of every member.

Mr. Lister—It provides for overdriving a hen.

Mr. Brown—It was a queer old rooster that said that. He asked hon. gentlemen if they would like to be cooped up in a box and then let loose only to be shot. The measure proposed would effectually stop these abuses.

Mr. Tisdale, in moving the six months' hoist, said he was not in favor of cruelty to animals, but he objected to people laying down a principle and then trying to put down things which did not rightly come under it. If he could understand what was aimed at he would be very glad. If it was desired to stop pigeon-shooting out of traps, why was it not plainly stated? The Bill declared that killing birds by the dozen was cruelty. It looked as if it was promoted in the interest of vegetarians. With the exception of that matter the Bill dealt with what was already covered or was objectionable. The Bill declared that any person might interfere to prevent cruelty. Surely the country had not arrived at such a pass when every man should have authority to interfere when he supposed there was a case of cruelty. If Mr. Brown saw a market woman wringing the necks of her chickens he would interfere, and we would have to eat them alive.

Mr. Charlton said the Bill commended itself to him and would receive his support on the understanding that it be referred to a committee, and modified if necessary.

Sir John Thompson said that the chief principle embodied in the Bill was that it is expedient to make a penal offence the use of live animals as a target. The Bill gave the right to interfere only where there was a case of cruelty. Many objections against the Bill were applicable against the present law.

Mr. Edwards approved of the Bill because it afforded the means of disposing of abandoned animals.

The House divided on Mr. Tisdale's motion, for the six months' hoist, which was lost on a vote of 71 yeas and 72 nays.

The Bill was read a second time.

Sir John Macdonald presented the annual report of the Department of Railways and Canals.

Sir John Thompson introduced a Bill respecting the rules of court in relation to criminal matters.

Mr. Edgar introduced a Bill to provide for placing on the free list articles of merchandise, the production of which may be controlled by trusts or combinations. The following is the text of the Bill:

Whereas it is expedient in the public interest to suppress the evils arising from trusts or combinations for the purpose of regulating or controlling the production or price of merchandise, manufactures, commodities, or products, therefore Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

Whenever an import duty is imposed by law on any merchandise, manufacture, commodity, or product which is manufactured or produced in Canada to an amount exceeding two hundred thousand dollars and over 80 per cent. of the aggregate value of the amount manufactured or produced in Canada shall be manufactured or produced by persons, partnerships or corporations who shall be parties to any agreement or agreements, combination or combinations, trust or trusts, for the purpose of regulating or controlling the production or price of such merchandise, manufactures, commodity, or product, all such merchandise, manufactures, commodities and products, during the continuance of such agreement or agreements, combination or combinations, trust or trusts, shall be admitted into Canada free of duty.

In order to determine whether any merchandise, manufacture, commodity or product shall be admitted free of duty under the foregoing provisions, it shall be the duty of the Treasury Board when information is received by the Minister of Finance of the existence of such agreement, etc., to investigate the facts with reference to it, having given public notice of the time and place of such investigation, and the Treasury Board shall have the same powers to enforce the attendance of witnesses and to compel them to give evidence as is vested in any court of record in civil cases.

If upon such investigation it shall appear that the merchandise, manufacture, commodity, or product come within the provisions of this Act, the Governor General shall by his proclamation order such merchandise to be admitted into Canada free of import duty.

Whenever such agreement, combination, etc., to the extent aforesaid shall cease to exist, the Governor General shall, upon the report of the Treasury Board to that effect, give notice thereof by proclamation, and thereafter the duty otherwise provided for by law shall be collected on such merchandise, etc.

He stated that the Bill proposed that whenever an import duty is imposed by law on a commodity manufactured in Canada to an amount exceeding two hundred thousand dollars in value, and over 80 per cent. of the aggregate value of the amount manufactured and produced in Canada, and which is produced by persons in a combination, then the article should be admitted into Canada free of duty. In order to determine whether or not the particular articles are subject to a combination, the Bill proposed that it should be the duty of the Treasury Board, upon complaint, to make an investigation, and if upon such investigation it should appear that the commodity was subject to a combination, the Governor-General should issue a proclamation ordering such articles to come in free of duty. Upon the combination ceasing to control the article the duty would be restored. The object of all these combinations, he said, was to prevent fair and open competition in the Canadian market, and to prevent such monopoly he thought we should remove the barrier which prevents competition from abroad in the particular articles in respect of which the monopoly exists.

Sir John Macdonald said he did not object to the introduction of the Bill, but it was possible that on examination it would be found that the subject of the Bill being a matter of trade and commerce it should be introduced by resolution.

The Bill was read a first time.

Mr. Foster, in answer to the inquiry of Mr. Langelier (Quebec), said that the total amount of $1,500,000 voted in 1885 for an extension to Quebec of the Canadian Pacific Railway has been paid. The sum of $970,000 had been paid to the Bank of Montreal for the bonds of the North Shore Railway, at 81½, and the remaining $570,000 was paid to the Grand Trunk Railway.

Mr. Kirkpatrick, in moving the second reading of the Act to permit foreign vessels to aid vessels wrecked or disabled in Canadian waters, expressed the hope that the Bill would meet with more favorable consideration in the House than it did last session. The measure was dictated by principles of humanity and of regard for the protection of property, which was often lost owing to the fact that the services of the most available wrecking tugs could not be utilized. Since the Bill was defeated last session the President of the United States thought the matter of sufficient importance to warrant a reference to it in his message, and he there expressed the hope that some amicable arrangement in regard to wrecking would be entered into between the two countries. The American people were jealously guarding their rights in this matter, and while they had an offer of reciprocity in wrecking on their statute books, conditional on our acceptance, they firmly refused to allow our wreckers to work in their waters until we grant like privileges to them. He moved the reference of the Bill to a select committee composed of Messrs. Cockburn, Bergeron, Edgar, Charlton, Labelle, Langelier (Quebec), Masson, Mulock, Shanly, Patterson (Essex), Weldon (St. John), Weldon (Albert), Holton and the mover.

Mr. Patterson (Essex) moved in amendment that the Bill in question, together with his Bill providing for reciprocity in the coasting trade, be referred to the select committee. He did not quite agree with the last speaker that considerations of humanity should lead us to make any particular advances to the people of the United States on this question. The Americans, whenever they sought reciprocity with Canada in any direction, were usually induced to do so with an eye to the material gain which was likely to accrue, and the adoption of the Bill now before the House would undoubtedly bring about complete reciprocity in inland navigation, which our neighbors were so desirous to secure.

Mr. Speaker ruled the amendment out of order. The question was on the second reading of the Bill, and its reference to the select committee named in the motion.

Mr. Patterson (Essex) moved in amendment that the select committee to which the Bill should be referred be composed of Messrs. Bowell, Tupper, Kirkpatrick, Ferguson (Welland), Boyle, Charlton, Lister, Prefontaine and the mover.

Sir John Macdonald said he would much prefer that the promoters of the two Bills should meet and agree on a committee, to which their respective measures could be referred. He reminded the House that the Bill of the member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) was rejected by the House at the last session. This was the same Parliament, and it was a serious thing to undo its own work, but he supposed that after the eloquent speech of the mover the House would be free to change its views if it decided to do so.

After some further discussion the amendment was withdrawn and the Bill was read a second time.

Mr. Burdett moved the second reading of a Bill against frauds in supplying milk to cheese and butter manufacturers.

Sir John Thompson said that as this was a criminal Bill, it should be referred to a select committee.

Mr. Burdett agreed to this course if it would not impede the progress of the Bill, which it was very desirable should be passed this session, in view of the fact that the Act by the Province of Ontario declard with that subject had been dealing ultra vires.

Sir John Thompson agreed that the Act should not be impeded.

The Bill was read a second time and referred to the Select Committee.

Mr. Jamieson, on the order for the further consideration of his motion declaring it expedient to prohibit the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors, and the amendments thereto, briefly addressed the House, urging the acceptance of his motion, and refusing to accept the amendments.

The House divided on Mr. Taylor's amendment calling for a plebiscite on a prohibition law which shall make full provision for compensating those engaged in the manufacture of such liquors, which was lost; yeas 58, nays 85.

On the question of the amendment of Mr. Wood (Brockville), providing for prohibition when the public sentiment of the country is ripe for its reception and enforcement.

Mr. Mills moved in amendment to the amendment that the following words should be added: "And that a vote of qualified electors of Canada be taken at a convenient time to ascertain the opinion of the country upon the question."

Mr. Taylor objected to the amendments before the House because they did not contain a provision for compensation to those engaged in the liquor trade.

Mr. Mills said he did not think the question of compensation should be submitted to a plebiscite.

Mr. Bergin did not believe that prohibition would be practicable for many years. Recourse should then be had to as efficient a license law as possible. He censured the professed temperance people for their insincerity and vacillation in connection with the enforcement of the Canada Temperance Act.

The amendment to the amendment was lost on a division; yeas 35, nays 127.

The main motion as amended was declared carried without a division. The motion is as follows: "That in the opinion of this House it is expedient to prohibit the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors except for sacramental, medicinal, scientific and mechanical purposes when the public sentiment of the country is ripe for the reception and enforcement of such a measure as prohibition."

Sir John Macdonald said he had heard that the Opposition intended to move an important amendment, and requested that it be laid over till Tuesday, as it might interfere with the arrangements of members who wished to go home over Sunday.

Sir Richard Cartwright agreed not to press the motion till Tuesday.

In Committee of Supply, on the item of $15,500 for printing voters' lists,

Mr. Foster substituted $10,000 for the amount named, and intimated that it was not probable that the sum would be used.

On the item of $10,000 for printing, binding and distributing the laws,

Mr. Bowell intimated that $6,000 would be sufficient, and that sum was substituted.

The item passed.

Mr. Shanly moved for the third reading of the Bill to incorporate the Alberta Railway & Coal Company.

Mr. Watson said it was of the utmost importance that the Northwest should have cheap coal. He moved that the Bill be referred back to the Committee of the Whole to insert a clause providing that the maximum rate for coal must not exceed 1 cent per mile.

Mr. Speaker ruled the motion out of order, as proper notice had not been given.

Mr. Trow said it would be an extreme hardship if the Government did not protect the settlers by restricting the tariff of the company. They should not be allowed to charge 100 per cent. over the cost of the coal.

Mr. Shanly said the House might as well fix the price of coal as fix the rate at which it should be carried.

Mr. Sproule said that it cost more than a cent a mile to carry coal in Ontario. The company were doing an important work for the Northwest, and should be allowed some privilege in return.

Mr. Mills held that Parliament had power to fix the rate, and it was their duty to do so.

The hour for the consideration of private bills having expired, the motion dropped.

Mr. Mills made an inquiry of the Government in reference to the accuracy of the press report that the Department of Fisheries had been informed that the Canadian vessels seized by the United States authorities in Behrings Sea, in 1887, would be sold next month. He asked whether or not there had been any correspondence with the Foreign Office on the subject, and of what nature; whether the Canadian Government had asked the British Government to send a cruiser to Behrings Sea to protect the Canadian vessels on the high seas; what answer had been received, and what was the present state of the correspondence between the American Government and the Foreign Office on the subject.

Sir Hector Langevin said he could hardly give the information at present. There had been some correspondence on the subject and the hon. gentleman should move for the papers.

Mr. Mills asked whether the Government would bring down the papers as a matter of course.

Mr. Tupper said that all the correspondence that had taken place up to the opening of the session had been brought down, and it was a question whether or not the subsequent correspondence could be made public.

The House then resumed in Committee of Supply.

A number of items in connection with the Central Experimental Farm were passed, after which the committee rose and reported.

Mr. Foster intimated that he hoped to be able to make his financial statement on Tuesday next.

Four Hundred Million Collisions of Meteors Daily.

Observations of falling stars have been used to determine roughly the average number of meteorites which attempt to pierce the earth's atmosphere during each 24 hours. Dr. Schmidt, of Athens, from observations made during seventeen years, found that the mean hourly number of luminous meteors visible on a clear moonless night by one observer was fourteen, taking the time of observation from midnight to 1 a.m. It has been further experimentally shown that a large group of observers who might include the whole horizon in their observations would see about six times as many as are visible to one eye. Prof. H. A. Newton and others have calculated that, making all possible corrections, the number which might be visible over the whole earth would be a little greater than 10,000 times as many as could be seen at one place. From this we gather that not less than 20,000,000 luminous meteors fall upon our planet daily, each of which in a dark clear night would present us with the well-known phenomenon of a shooting star. This number, however, by no means represents the total number of minute meteorites that enter our atmosphere, because many entirely invisible to the naked eye are often seen in telescopes. It has been calculated that the number of meteorites, if these were included, would be increased at least twenty-fold; this would give us 400,000,000 of meteorites falling in the earth's atmosphere daily.—Prof. Lockyer in Harper's for March.

THREE MEN KILLED.

Horrible Deaths of Trainmen in a Railway Accident.

A Bangor, Me., despatch says: A serious accident occurred to the morning train from Bangor to St. John, near Boyd's Mills, two miles east of Kingman, at 10 a.m. Mail clerk David Palmer, who was on the mail car, gives the following account of the disaster: When the train reached Boyd's Mills, the scene of the accident, he was sitting on a table in the front of the car, M. C. Mudgett, of Dexter, chief clerk, near him, with his feet on the stove, and John Campbell, a clerk, was on the table. When the shock came the cars went over in a heap, rolling over several times. The train consisted of engine, mail, baggage, Pullman, smoker and three passenger cars. The first five left the track, but the other three kept on running upon a side track. The mail car, baggage, Pullman and smoker caught fire like a flash, being entirely consumed within fifteen minutes. The train had been running at full speed, and a misplaced switch caused the derailment. Palmer, Mudgett and Campbell were held like a vise by the timbers of the shattered car, the former with part of a letter rack over his legs and Mudgett under the stove. Campbell's back was broken. The dense smoke from the burning cars and steam from the engine boiler hung over the mail car. All shouted for help; Mudgett cried to Palmer that he was being burned, and bade him good-bye. Palmer thrust up one arm through an opening and was seen by Conductor Chase, who attempted to pull him out, but was unable to do so. Three others joined him, and finally succeeded in removing him in a bruised condition. They were unable to reach Mudgett and Campbell before they burned to death. Harry Goodwin, fireman, was killed, and Julius Angell, engineer, was cut severely, but none of the passengers were hurt. The injured were taken to the Kingman House, in Kingman, where their wants were attended to. All cars were equipped with Sewall heaters, but the fire caught from the stove used in the mail car. The main track is but little damaged, and a construction crew, which arrived about 5 p. m., cleared off the debris.

SMALLPOX AT FINGAL.

Churches, Schools and Skating Rinks Closed—Compulsory Vaccination to be Enforced.

A St. Thomas despatch says: During the past two weeks many rumors have been circulated in this city regarding an epidemic which has made its appearance in Fingal, a small village about six miles west of the city, and has already resulted in the death of two married women, while a number of others are suffering from the disease in that locality. The local physicians from the first have pronounced the malady chickenpox, but as the results are of such a serious nature the Board of Health of Southwold yesterday took the matter in hand to find out the exact nature of the disease and take the necessary precautions to prevent its spreading. Dr. Tweedale, medical health officer of St. Thomas, was summoned, and after making a careful examination of the different cases pronounced the disease undoubtedly smallpox, and his opinion was corroborated to-day by other city physicians. The Board of Health thereupon decided to close the churches, schools and skating rinks, and also to enforce compulsory vaccination. All sorts of rumors are afloat in the city to-night, many of which are groundless, but it is undoubtedly true that there are a number of new cases developing in the vicinity of Fingal. The Southwold Board of Health have been advised to quarantine all houses in which cases exist and see that the families are comfortably provided for. A special meeting of the St. Thomas Board of Health will be held this evening to consider the report of Drs. Tweedale and VanBuskirk.

Hints for Slippery Weather.

Ladies in such weather cannot safely dispense with bustles.

Always laugh at a man who slips down. He would laugh at you.

You may perhaps be allowed to wonder at times why men don't wear bustles.

If you break a suspender don't swear. Take a tug at the buckle in the back of your trousers.

Don't brush off your clothes. Appear to be serenely unconscious that they are not all right.

If both shoulders touch the ground, the fall, according to the wrestling rules, is awarded to the sidewalk.

Never slip down in sight of your own house. One prefers to be laughed at by strangers rather than by one's wife.

If you feel yourself falling and there's a man within reach grab him. In this way you often secure somebody to fall on.

Always wonder why the City Council doesn't pass a law compelling everybody to put ashes on his icy sidewalk.

Don't walk too near the store fronts. If you should go through a plate glass window you would have to pay a big bill for damages.

Swearing at the man who never sprinkles ashes on his sidewalk is considered good manners by every authority on etiquette during icy weather.

If you slip down endeavor to look pleased. It indicates a superior order of mind. If you look pained it but adds to the mirth of people who see you.

Above all, take heed where you stand when laughing at somebody else while puffed up with pride in your own sure footedness. Pride often has a tumble.

As your legs go lurching and lunging in one direction and another over the slippery places occasionally, vow to set a good example by sprinkling ashes on your own sidewalk.

Always fall down rather than fracture your spinal column in efforts to keep your feet. No man can feel an unalloyed satisfaction in his escapes from tumbles when his entire frame is wrenched and sore.

If you see any one near you sprawled out on the sidewalk say good-naturedly: "Come here, and I'll pick you up." This is important. It is always said on such occasions, and pleases a man when he's down.

A man named Slade has just died in great agony from swallowing a sugar crusher whilst drinking a glass of grog at Crewkerne, Somerset.

ONTARIO LEGISLATURE.

The following Bills were introduced and read the first time:

Mr. Waters—To amend the Assessment Act.

Mr. Hardy—To give representation in the Legislature to Nipissing district.

Mr. Mowat—To make further provisions respecting Parry Sound and Muskoka, also, respecting appeals on prosecutions for enforced penalties under the Provincial Act.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton) brought down returns relating to insurance companies.

The following Bills were read the second time:

To confer certain powers upon the Board of Trade of the city of Toronto—Mr. Leys.

To legalize a by-law of the town of Galt and other purposes—Mr. Master.

Mr. Clarke (Wellington), in moving the second reading of the Bill for the better protection of insectivorous and other birds, said he presented the Bill at the request of the biological section of the Canadian Institute. He did not approve of all its provisions, but the section could be heard in their advocacy before a special committee.

The Bill was read the second time and referred to a special committee.

The following Bills were read the second time:

To amend the Registry Act—Mr. Wood (Hastings.) The object of the Bill was to provide for the registration of payments on account of mortgages.

To amend the Ontario Election Act (Mr. Balfour) by providing that information and notices regarding the holding of elections in Pelee Island may be sent by telephone.

To amend the Municipal Act (Mr. Cruess) by allowing 300 voters for each polling division instead of 200.

Mr. Mowat said there was no provision in the Bill for certifying the signatures to receipts, but no doubt the Law Committee would be able to suggest something.

The House again went into Committee of Supply and resumed consideration of the estimates. The following items passed:

Mr. Fraser explained that the only additional cost to the country from the appointment of a Minister of Agriculture was that Minister's own salary, and the pay of a shorthand writer at $650.

Mr. Creighton said that the contingencies had at any rate doubled.

The committee rose and reported.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton) brought down the report of the Inspector of Prisons and Charities.

In reply to an objection made by Mr. Clancy,

Mr. Ross (Huron) said the tender and contract system did not work well in regard to the groceries for the public institutions Two years ago the Government had to return to the system of buying to the best advantage wherever they could.

Messrs. H. E. Clarke and Meredith objected to the extra payments made to Mr. Crackle, of the Toronto Asylum, who as master mason received a salary of $650, and who was paid extra amounts, bringing the total sum up to $1,250.

Mr. Hardy said Mr. Crackle was paid extra amounts for services in checking an outbreak of diphtheria at Penetanguishene

Mr. Meredith said that one result of the investigation last year was that one item of two thousand dollars had been brought to light—he referred to the Agricultural College—but the most diligent inquiry had failed to find a detailed account of the manner in which this money had been expended.

Mr. A. M. Ross said that this money had been placed to the credit of the institution in a local bank, and cheques out in the regular way to meet the current expenses of the institution. But it was quite true that a detailed statement of the uses to which the money had been put could not be found.

Mr. Wood said there were grave rumors current about irregularities at the Deaf and Dumb Institution at Belleville.

Hon. Mr. Hardy said that the Inspector had brought this to his attention in an indirect way, and that there was some bad bookkeeping at Belleville. The system, however, had been changed so as to do away with any possibility of irregularity.

Mr. French referred to the bad sanitary system used in the London Asylum, also to the outbreak of diphtheria in Penetanguishene Reformatory. He read a clause from the report of Col. Waring reflecting on the sanitation of the London Asylum.

Mr. Fraser defended the system in use at the London institution, and said that Col. Waring was not called upon to give an opinion on the sanitary condition of the London Asylum; that he was called in as an expert to pronounce upon the best method of disposing of sewage. With respect to the sanitary system in London, it received the approval of gentlemen just as good authorities as Col. Waring.

Mr. Meredith said that there was no reason why the hon. gentleman should take these criticisms as personal affronts. Col. Waring had been called in as an expert by the Government to pronounce upon sanitation. He had done so, but now, since he reflected upon the system adopted by the Government, the hon. gentlemen make haste to repudiate him.

Mr. Craig wanted to know how it was that clothing for Hamilton, London and Toronto asylums had been bought from a Toronto firm, Hughes Bros.

Mr. Hardy said that he supposed the reason why so much clothing had been purchased from Hughes Bros. was that that firm had been selling out and cheap bargains were offered.

Mr. Craig would like to know if special instructions were given o the bursars where to purchase goods public institutions.

Mr. Hardy said that as far as he knew no special instructions were issued to the bursars to purchase only from Conservative dealers. (Laughter). The bursars purchased to suit their own convenience.

Mr. Meredith, in a brief speech, characterized the action of the Government as farming out patronage so as to bind certain trades to the chariot wheels of their party.

Mr. Fraser challenged the Opposition to state a case where the Government at Ottawa ever allowed their officers to purchase of political opponents. If the Opposition could show that the Government had paid too much for certain articles there would be legitimate ground for criticism. It was simply ridiculous to affect horror at the Government patronizing their political friends. If the Opposition were in power to-morrow they would under the same system do exactly the same as the Government were doing. In the matter of supplies to institutions the tender system was not always the best. They had a glaring instance of the abuse of the tender system in the case of the supplies to Indians. So long as the public interests were protected the Government were not going to pass over their political friends in order to benefit their political opponents. (Applause)

The items in dispute passed.

An Act to incorporate the Sarnia, Lambton & London Railway—Mr. Graham.

An Act to Amend the Municipal Act—Mr. Garson.

An Act respecting the Toronto, Hamilton & Buffalo Railway—Mr. O'Connor.

Mr. McMahon moved the second reading of his Bill to facilitate the purchase of toll roads by municipalities. The Bill is substantially to furnish machinery for the object named. The Bill was read a second time and sent to the Municipal Committee.

Mr. Garson moved the second reading of his Bill respecting the examination of engineers and inspection of boilers. The Bill, he said, differed but little from that introduced by him last year, and it was unnecessary for him to explain it in detail. The principle of the Bill is the appointment of inspectors for the compulsory examination and certificating of persons having charge of boilers, and also for the proper examination of boilers. It was discussed briefly and, as a rule, favorably. Mr. Phelps and Mr. Wood, of Brant, were well disposed to it. So was Mr. Meredith, but he thought the Government ought to assume responsibility for or against it. Mr. Rayside and Mr. Graham raised points of objection. The Bill was read and referred to a special committee.

Mr. Ferguson moved the second reading of his Bill to amend the Municipal Act in respect to arbitrations, as previously explained. The Bill proposes to make the County Judge the arbitrator in cases of arbitration occurring under the Act, and his award to be final. Mr. Meredith and Mr. Hardy both commented on the importance of the Bill, the latter hon. gentleman taking occasion to suggest in connection with it that bills of such importance should receive a discussion in the House before they went to committee. Many important changes to the municipal law were discussed in committee, and the public knew nothing about what was being done, whereas by a discussion in the House they were generally made aware of the nature of any intended changes. Mr. Balfour approved the principle of the Bill, because he thought it would have a tendency to reduce the present heavy cost of arbitrations and the evil growing out of the existence of so many professional arbitrators. Mr. Waters objected that the Bill was a very radical one, and in some particulars at least would prove a retrograde step. Mr. Whitney thought that under the present system of arbitration very many of the arbitrators simply considered themselves bound to support the claim of the party they represented. The Bill was read a second time and referred to the Municipal Committee.

Mr. Hudson's Bill to amend the Municipal Act by prohibiting colorable transfers of property in order to qualify as a voter was read a second time.

Mr. Whitney moved to amend the Act respecting seduction as follows:

Any person authorized so to do in writing by any unmarried female who has neither father nor mother living, or who has neither father nor mother capable of bringing an action for her seduction under this Act, may bring and maintain an action as the master of such unmarried female, for her seduction; and upon the trial of such action it shall not be necessary to give proof of any act of service performed by the person seduced, but the same shall in all cases be presumed, and no proof shall be received to the contrary.

Hon. Mr. Fraser strongly opposed the measure. It would considerably extend the field for litigation in connection with the Act, the latitude allowed by which was already, in his opinion, much abused. He did not see why such a fiction as that proposed should be introduced into the law.

Mr. Whitney would withdraw the Bill if the Government insisted, but he suggested a compromise.

Mr. French defended the Bill.

Mr. Meredith thought the Bill should go to committee.

The Attorney-General thought the Bill was too general in character to remedy the evil it was aimed at. He suggested that a new Bill should be introduced to meet the difficulty complained of.

Mr. O'Connor—Under the present law orphan girls, as well as illegitimate unmarried women who have no master, are unable to bring action for damages for seduction.

The Bill was then withdrawn.

Mr. Freeman's Bill to amend the Line Fences Act was read a second time. Mr. Dacks' Bill to amend the Municipal Act was advanced to a similar stage.

Two Bills standing in the name of Mr. Bronson—the first to amend the Timber Slide Companies Act, and the second to amend the Act for the protection of game and fur-bearing animals, were read a second time. The proposed amendment to the game law is as follows:

Any person furnishing satisfactory evidence as to any of the said animals or birds, or any part or portion of any such animals or birds found in his or her possession during the periods in which they are so protected, that the killing, taking or purchasing was done prior to such periods, or in any place outside of the limits of this Province at a time when such killing, taking or purchasing was not there prohibited, or in any place outside the Dominion of Canada, shall be exempt from the penalties of this Act; provided that they may be exposed for sale for fifteen days and no longer after such periods.

A Bill introduced by Mr. Waters to make more intelligible the 590th section of the Municipal Act was read a second time. A Bill introduced by Mr. Graham to amend the Municipal Act by declaring that no municipal corporation shall be required to fence or otherwise guard any ditch or watercourse running along any public highway when the depth of such ditch or watercourse does not exceed two feet, was read a second time.

SYMPATHY WITH IRELAND.

Resolution to be Introduced into the Dominion Parliament.

Mr. H. H. Cook (Liberal) has given notice that he will move the following resolution in the Dominion House of Commons:

That the Parliament of Canada, in the year 1882, adopted an humble address to Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen, expressing the hope that a just measure of Home Rule should be granted to the people of Ireland, and that in the year 1886, by resolution of the House of Commons, the sentiments of the said address were earnestly reiterated and the House again expressed the hope that such a measure of Home Rule would be passed by the Imperial Parliament;

That in the year 1887, by resolution of the House of Commons, profound regret was expressed at the introduction of a Coercion Bill for Ireland into the Imperial Commons, and a hope was expressed that as subversive of the rights and liberties of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland it might not become law, and the further hope was expressed that instead of the Coercion Bill a substantial measure of Home Rule would be granted to Ireland.

That the House has learned with profound regret that no measure of Home Rule has yet been introduced for Ireland, but that the rights and liberties of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland have been subverted by the Coercion Bill against which this House protested in 1887.

That the coercive Irish legislation of the Imperial Parliament and the administration of Irish affairs in accordance therewith have aroused among the Irish and other people of the United States a state of feeling which prejudicially affects the relations between the Dominion of Canada and the United States;

That this state of feeling in the United States conduced to the recent rejection of the Fisheries and Extradition Treaties, and militates powerfully against such amicable settlement of matters in dispute between Canada and the United States as would promote in a high degree the welfare of Her Majesty's subjects in this Dominion;

That the granting of Home Rule to Ireland will not only gratify Her Majesty's loyal subjects in the Dominion, but will materially assist to establish on an enduring basis profitable and perfectly friendly relations between the Dominion and the United States, with the effect of relieving Her Majesty's Government from dangerous complications;

That the present resolutions be forwarded to the Right Hon. the Marquis of Salisbury, Prime Minister, and to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, M.P., and Charles Stewart Parnell, M.P.

The Kind of a Wife You Want.

You say you demand a domestic, useful woman as your wife. If that is so, marry Nora Mulligan, your laundress' daughter. She wears cowhide shoes, is guiltless of corsets, never had a sick day in her life, takes in washing, goes out house cleaning and cooks for a family of seven children, her mother and three section men who board with her. I don't think she would marry you, because Con Reagan, the track walker, is her style of man. Let us examine into your qualifications as a model husband after your own matrimonial ideas, my boy. Can you shoulder a barrel of flour and carry it down cellar? Can you saw and split ten cords of hickory wood in fall, so as to have ready fuel all winter? Can you spade up a half acre of ground for a kitchen garden? Do you know what will take the lime taste out of the cistern, and can you patch the little leak in the kitchen roof? Can you bring home a pane of glass and a wad of putty and repair damages in the sitting-room window? Can you hang some cheap paper on the kitchen? Can you fix the front gate so it will not sag? Can you do anything about the house that Con Reagan can? My dear, dear boy, you see Nora Mulligan wants a higher type of true manhood. You expect to hire men to do all the man's work about the house, but you want your wife to do anything any woman can do. Believe me, my son, that nine-tenths of the girls who play the piano and sing so charmingly, whom you in your limited knowledge set down as mere butterflies of fashion, are better fitted for wives than you are for a husband. If you want to marry a first class cook and experienced housekeeper, do your courting in the intelligence office. But if you want a wife, marry the girl you love, with dimpled hands and a face like the sunlight, and her love will teach her all these things, my boy, long before you have learned one-half of your own lesson. —Bob Burdette in Burlington Hawkeye.

Dressed Horseflesh as Human Food.

At Gorton Police Court, Manchester, the other day John Henry Rushton, butcher, 185 Ashton road, Openshaw, was charged with offering diseased meat for sale. Mr. Crofton said that on the day in question the nuisance inspector (Mr. Stansfield) of then Board paid a visit to the shop of the defendant, and there found three-quarters of a beast and some liver, apparently diseased. A seizure was made, and on the report of Mr. Locke, veterinary surgeon, Manchester, the meat was condemned by Mr. Coloke, one of the county magistrates. The meat was in a horrible state. Mr. Stansfied, on being called, said in reply to the bench that the meat was dressed for sale in the ordinary way. It was horse beef. It was stated that the accused had several shops in Manchester and Salford. He was sent to prison for three months!

Canada's Chief Industry.

Olive Logan says the Philadelphia Times: The following conversation took place recently between myself and one of the most popular captains of the French line.

Captain—I like Americans, but they have such an absurd idea of the greatness of their country. Why, the United States are not so large as France.

Passenger—Indeed, have you seen much of the United States?

Captain—Oh, yes. I have been West.

Passenger—How far?

Captain—To Niagara Falls. That finishes the coutry. The rest is Canada, which is inhabid principally by French people.

A WOMAN'S KNEE.

Its Contemplation Plunges a Brooklyn Lawyer into Poetic Rhapsody.

The suit of Mrs. Wilhelmina Goepel against the Long Island Railroad Company for $20,000 damages resulted in a verdict in favor of that lady of $7,583.33. Mr. Mirabeau L. Towns appeared for Mrs. Goepel, and Hinsdale & Sprague for the railroad company. Mrs. Goepel was injured while crossing the track of the Long Island Railroad on Atlantic avenue near Albany, by her foot getting caught between the rail and the beam placed to keep it in position. Her leg was broken at the knee and above and below it. Mr. Towns' summing up of the case was one of the most peculiar forensic efforts heard in any court in this city. Referring to the injury to Mrs. Goepel's knee, he said:

"What swarms of memories are aroused by that word. Upon its soft cushion the infant rests when the cold air of this world first kisses its embryal cheek. Kneeling, we receive the first instructive maternal care. There the suitor wins his fortune, the lover adores his mistress, and the warrior receives the charge of his enemy, and, when the god of love shoots his last bolt in vain against obdurate maidenhood upon the knee, he mounts, as on a charge to break through squares of unyelding femininity. A woman's knee—ah, a charming configuration of beauteous line, traced in honey by perfection's magic wand!

Breathes there a man with soul so dead
Who never to himself has said
The fairest thing on earth to me
Is lovely woman's beauteous knee
Inspirer of ancient chivalry,
A bunch of life's umbrageous tree.

Midst lace and brilliant foliage
Gleams the joyous garter of fruit,
The golden fleece for which this age
Makes Argonautic pilgrimage,
The modern warrior's battle wage,
Ah, could in language bifanute
Thy meed of praise would burst my lute.

"Galen, father of anatomy, had his first idea of the glories of that science awakened by the beauteous vision of a woman's knee. But, gentlemen, words cannot do justice to the subject. Thank God, it is one of those things which all may appreciate though few can describe, and yet we have had here an aspiring genius from the realms of physic who describes the paucity of its injuries without, as he says, having seen it."

SINGULAR PREMONITIONS.

A Man Twice Saves His Life by Obeying Mysterious Impulses.

A few minutes after the fall of the Weldin building, while a crowd was gathering to view the ruins in which so many mangled and dead people lay, a stranger who was gazing at the wrecked structures from the opposite side of Wood street entered into conversation with a Pittsburg reporter. He said:

"For about five years on every week day, I have passed along that side of Wood street at about the hour this terrible accident occurred. To-day I was on my way to Fifth avenue, and had reached the Chamber of Commerce building when a sudden impulse came upon me to take the other side of the street. I crossed over, and before I reached the sidewalk the crash came. Had I kept along as I was going I would have been in front of the Weldin building just in time to be crushed by bricks and falling timber. I can no more account for the action which probably saved my life than you can; I simply felt that I must do it and I do not know that I felt even a premonition of danger.

"Years ago I escaped being robbed and possibly murdered in a way that was equally remarkable. At the time I was a collector in the Province of Ontario. One bitter cold winter evening I found myself in a small town about fifty miles from Toronto with a large sum of money in my possession. Having determined to go to Toronto that night on the 9 o'clock train, I telegraphed to the hotel where I usually stopped and asked that a room be reserved for me and a fire put in it. When the train came along I got on the front of the smoking car, walked through the car, through the next one, then got off and walked to the telegraph office and sent another message to the Toronto hotel stating that I had changed my mind and was not coming that night. What led me do so was more than I could tell—the same indefinable impulse that controlled me to-day had possession of me.

"I went back to the house where I had taken supper and remained there all night. The next morning I read in the Toronto paper of an assault and attempted robbery of a man who had arrived in that city on the train I was going to take but did not. The man was sandbagged while on his way from the depot to the hotel, and from the description given he must have been my exact counterpart—dress, size, color of hair and even the cut of his whiskers, being like my own. The thugs had mistaken him for me and they knew I had money.

For the Ladies.

Mary Anderson has worn a gown in the belt of which are some fine cameos.

Mary, the daughter of Charles Dickens, jun., is playing a part in "Little Lord Fauntleroy" on the English stage.

The women of New Orleans propose to open a cotton palace during the carnival season for the cause of charity.

Marie Frances Norton, a sister of Chas. J. Guiteau, has recently published a novel, mainly devoted to a defence of her brother. She calls the book "The Stalwarts: or, Who Were to Blame?"

Some of the working women of Boston have organized themselves into a society for the protection of their rights and the improvement of their condition socially and mentally."

A company of ladies in London are building a home and hotel for "ladies" who earn their own living and desire to have a home of their own. Under the term "lady" is understood all women who by birth and education are entitled to rank among gentlewomen. The building is to cost £20,000. Upward of £11,000 has already been subscribed in £1 shares.

"Mrs. William Astor," says the Sun telling of the coming costume ball, "has a court dress in preparation which for gorgeousness and costliness far exceeds anything that was ever worn by an Eastern potentate. The Shah of Persia himself could hardly outshine her. Pink coats, with black silk continuations, or rather abbreviations, will be very generally worn by the men."

Prayer for a Mother-in-Law.

At one of the recent Moody revival meetings on the Pacific Coast the customary request was made that those suffering from any particularly heavy burden should stand up and ask for the prayers of the assembled multitude. After a few moment's silence, a tall, meek-looking man arose, and in a voice choked with emotion asked that the prayers of the congregation might be offered for his mother-in-law. Instead of praying, the congregation first began to titter, and finally roared into laughter.

Trousers as a Dignifier.

Husband—My dear, those trousers are saved at the bottom.

Wife—They are the best you've got, John, except your dress trousers.

Husband—Well, give them to me. I have an important interview on hand to-day in which I expect to be at different times proud, haughty, indifferent, dignified, and perhaps a trifle disdainful. A man can't be all that successfully with fringe on the bottom of his trousers.

Sympathizing with the Wrong One.

She—What a shame Mr. Ivison should be so intemperate! He is just ruining himself by it.

He—Ruining himself! It's the brightest thing he ever did. He is just engaged to a half-a-million girl who is bent on reforming him.

At the Club.

Harry—Drinking brandy, Charley? That's something new for you.

Charley—Yes; promised my wife this morning I wouldn't drink a drop of whiskey to-day.

A Pleasant Assurance.

"I am told that I resemble your wife a good deal."

"You do, in one particular, Mr. Quimby."

"What's that?"

"My wife is no gentleman."

The Kind They Like.

"What kind of stories do bald-headed men prefer?" asked McSwilligen.

"Don't know. I'm not bald," replied Squildig. "What kind?"

"Hair-raising stories, of course."

PRIZE FARM COMPETITION.

From a circular published by the Agricultural and Arts Association we glean the following information in reference to the coming prize competition for best managed farm. Group 3 comprises the counties of Bruce, Dufferin, Wellington, Huron, Perth, and Grey. In this group the association offers for competition a gold medal; for each county a silver medal, and for each township a bronze medal. Thinking that possibly some of our Artemesia or surrounding township farmers may be induced to compete, we append the rules which are to govern:

Any farmer desiring to compete shall make his application in writing to the Secretary of the Agricultural Society of his Township on or before 1st May of each year, upon which said Society may call a meeting for the purpose of deciding which of the applicants shall be returned to this Association; but no Township Society shall return more than three competitors.

The full name and address of the selected applicants attested by the Secretary and President of the Agricultural Society, to be sent to the Secretary of this Association on or before the 15th May annually.

There shall be four judges appointed by this Association, two to go together from outside the District being examined, who shall be paid their actual travelling expenses. In case of a dispute between the Judges, the President of this Association shall be called upon to act as referee.

The Judges shall keep a detail of marks awarded to each farm visited. They shall award to the best managed farm in each Township Society a bronze medal, where three farms have competed, and instead thereof to the best managed farm in the Electorial Division Society a silver medal, and to the best farm in the whole Group a gold medal.

In addition to any other points that may be desirable by the Judges, the following shall be taken into consideration in estimating what is "the best managed farm."

1. The competing farm to be not less than one hundred acres, two thirds of which must be under cultivation. 2. The nature of the farming, whether mixed, dairy or any other mode, to be the most suitable under conditions affected by local circumstances. 3. The proper position in relation to the whole farm. 4. The attention paid to the preservation of timber, and shelter by planting of trees. 5. The condition of any private road. 6. The character, sufficiency, and condition of fences, and the manner in which the farm is subdivided into fields. 7. Improvements by removal of obstacles to cultivation, increasing drainage. 8. General condition of buildings, including dwelling house, and their adaptability to the wants of the farm and family. 9. The management, character, suitability, condition, and number of live stock kept. 10. The number, condition, and suitability of implements and machinery. 11. State of the garden and orchard. 12. Management of the yard manure. 13. The cultivation of crops to be as manuring, clearing, produce per acre in relation to management, and character of soil and climate. 14. General order, economy and water supply. 15. Cost of production and relative profits.

The examination by the Judges to be not earlier than 25th May, and to be finished in September.

The two Judges shall decide the Township and Electorial Division prizes by themselves, taking notes of the farm or farms for the gold medal for the group, when all four Judges will soon visit the farms selected for that purpose and decide.

The report of the Judges to be submitted to the Board, and forwarded to the Commissioner of Agriculture.

A SMOKING CHURCH.

Dr. Parker, of the London Temple, is instituting a "smoking church" where all may indulge in the soothing use of the weed, or not, as they may feel inclined. It sounds strange to hear the Toronto Globe championing the act, and advising its trial. And yet there is something to be said in favor of it, at least as an experiment. There is a class in every large city who never enter a church door. A "smoking church" would probably attract them, through curiosity if nothing else. The scheme, it appears, is not at all new in Germany, as the following will show: A prominent Scottish divine, a good many years ago, went as deputy to a Synod meeting in Holland. On his return he wrote and published a graphic account of his experiences. He had, he said, been in the valley and shadow of smoke. The Dutch Synod Hall had been redolent of tobacco, and all the grave and reverend divines had even in official hours been given over to idolatry, though, fortunately with them it took the form of idol-burning. The Moderator smoked assiduously "in the chair," only pausing in the process to take the vote, or to call an unruly brother to order. The clerk plied his pen while his meerschaum rested on the table and the smoke curled curiously like a "glory" round his head. At intervals on the tables round which the members sat there were dishes containing pieces of burning peat, from which a light could always be procured, and canisters of tobacco from which the emptied bowls could always be replenished. It was a sight of placid satisfaction which nothing but a smoking club could supply and nothing but a smoking Synod could endure.

Canada and the United States.

Prof. J. G. Schurman, author of "The Ethical Import of Darwinism," now Professor of Philsophy at Cornell University, is a native of Nova Scotia and was formerly a member of the faculty of Dalhousie College, Halifax. He took a leading part in the first meeting (in 1885) of the Imperial Federation League at Montreal, and he has been a thorough student of Canada politics. He is the latest contributor to the discussion in the Forum of the possible annexation of Canada to the United States. Prof. Schurman sees so great a career for Canada that he opposes annexation. He reviews the history of the Provinces, describes the vast territory and resourses, and concludes that in their development a rapidly increasing population will find labor and riches; and that the future holds too large a promise for Canadians to be willing to make such a breach of their traditions as to become a part of the United States. "Look at a map," he writes, "and you will see that within the latitude of Canada are included, in the Old world, Norway and Sweden, European and Asiastic Russia (excepting only the most southerly projection), Denmark, Prussia, Holland, Belgium, the northern section of France and the whole of Great Britain and Ireland. From the countries come the race that succeeded Rome in bearing, as they still largely bear, the civilization of the world. And analogy suggests that under the bracing climate of Canada, in centuries yet to come, civilization may in the New World find its sturdiest supporters. The new provinces will in a very few years be the regal house of prosperous millions. Nature has said it. Canadians need not be anxious about the money spent in opening up the northwest. Nature is their bondsman. They have only to stand still and see the salvation of the Lord. . . . I have described the territory, resources, financial condition, population, and political organization of the new Dominion of Canada. The picture, though faithful, may be somewhat new to Americans, whose view of Canada might be summed up in the words: 'We have a little sister, and she hath no breast.'"

Other articles on Canada annexation that have appeared in recent numbers of the Forum are, "Obstacles to Annexation," by the Marquis of Lorne; "Is Union with Canada Desirable?" by Senator J. S. Morrill; and "Canada and the United States," by Prof. Goldwin Smith.—Selected.

Around the Town Hall Table.

Artemesia Council met on Monday, March 4. Present, Messrs. Cairns, McArthur, Boland and Sharp. Mr. Cairns, deputy reeve, presiding. Minutes of February session read and confirmed.

Bylaw No. 450 to appoint municipal officers was introduced and read first time, and partially filled in committee. Laid over until next meeting for completion.

Mr. Boland presented order bylaw to encourage and regulate planting of trees on highways and boundary lines of lots.

Deputations from S.S. No. 9 and 10 waited upon Council in reference to adding more territory to No. 10. A lively discussion by those for and against the revision took place. The council decided to throw out the petition.

Moved by Messrs. Boland and Sharp, that the petition of Jas. McMullen and others, on S. S. No. 10, be not entertained. Carried.

Moved by Messrs. McArthur and Boland, that the auditors report be referred back to the special committee to report at next meeting of Council. Carried.

Moved by Messrs. McArthur and Boland, that W. J. Bellamy be paid the sum of thirteen dollars for registration of births, marriages and deaths, under sec. 30 of chap 4, Revised statutes of Ontario. Carried.

The following accounts were ordered to be paid: C. W. Rutledge, assessment rolls, schedules, assessors' guide and express, $11.40; T.B. Gilliland, for services as engineer in the matter in dispute between John Simpson and William McDonald, of the village of Priceville, and that the clerk be and is hereby requested to notify McDonald and request a settlement at once.

This finished the business of the Council.

A. O. U. W.

The eleventh annual session of the Grand Lodge of the Ancient Order of United Workmen was held in Victoria Hall, Toronto, on the 20th and 21st ult. Over three hundred and fifty representatives, and officials were present. The reports of the various officers were presented, taken up seriatim and adopted.

The phenomenal growth of the society, and the success it has achieved in working its way into every corner of Ontario, has surpassed the expectations of its promoters and baffled the omirous predictions of its opponents. Eleven or twelve years ago not a single lodge of Workmen could be found in the province—to-day we can boast of over three hundred lodges with upwards of sixteen thousand members, and every day new members are being added to the ranks. No fraternal society is more prompt in the payment of claims and no insurance organization is more strict in the choice of its members.

During the year just passed two hundred and twenty-two thousand dollars have been paid to the widows and orphans of deceased members and without litigation. The provinces of Manitoba and Quebec are awakening to the importance of having such protection as the A. O.U.W. is willing to offer and the time is not far distant when the society will be found in every part of the Dominion.

WHAT IS THIS A.O.U.W.

that we hear so much about? It is a "fraternal organization for the mutual benefit of its members and their families. It embraces in its membership men of every vocation, profession and occupation—employers and employes—workers of all classes whether their labor be mental or physical. It has no connection with any religious sect, political party or organization for affecting the prices of labor or commodities, but is designed to promote fraternity, mental and social improvement and mutual assistance. The most distinctive feature of the order is what is designated as The Beneficiary Fund, a carefully devised, well guarded, economical and beneficial system, by means of which the sum of two thousand dollars is secured to each member's family or such persons as he may choose to designate." Who may become a member of this society? Every free white male between the ages of twenty one and fifty years in good bodily health and competent to earn a livlihood for himself and his family. What does it cost a member holding a benificary certificate for $2000? No member in Ontario can be assessed for a sum exceeding nineteen dolars per annum, but the average cost since the organization of the A.O.U.W. has not exceeded fourteen dollars.

Richard Doyle, reeve of Arthur township, lost three children by diphtheria.

P. Dickenson, of Holstein, lost a valuable Jersey cow. The animal got loose and overfed on chopped stuff.

DEATH ON THE TRACK.

10 Killed and 30 Wounded in a G.T.R. Railway Disaster.

ST. GEORGE Feb. 27.—The St. Louis express train running east on the main line of the Great Western Division of the Grand Trunk railway, met with a terrible accident at this point as she was passing through at lightning speed. The large iron bridge about three quarters of a mile south collapsed, carrying with it the latter part of the train, consisting of the dining car, a Pullman and a first-class coach. The rest of the train crossed in safety. Of those three cars two fell to the ground, namely, the dining car and the coach while the Pullman hangs suspended from the bridge, which broke about the fourth strand from the end. The bridge is an iron trestle with stone brim ents, some 300 feet long. The occupants of the two cars, which were pretty well crowded, were hurled below to a depth of over 60 feet and most of them who were not killed outright were mangled in a shocking manner.

THE KILLED.

W. M. Wear, London; E. R. Bairns, London; Geo. Leggatt, Mitchell; A. W. Frances, Woodstock; Dr. Swan, Woodstock; Miss Moore, Brantford; Joseph [illegible], Woodstock; Mr. McLean, Detroit; Harry Angle, Fireman; A. Waiter, name unknown.

THE INJURED.

Miss McLeod, Ingersoll; Mary Chafic, Pontiac, Mich; James Hyslop, Goderich; John McKinley, Detroit; Fred Hancock, London, Thos. N. Doutney, lecturer; John H. Wilson, Chatham; George Margetts, Niagara Falls; R. Hilton, St. Catharines; Mr. McLaughlin, London; Wm. Benedict, Saniac, Mich; D. H. Lequesne, Cleveland; W. Vincent, Paris; H. Johnson, Windsor; D. D. Cooper, Niagara Falls; Miss Andrews, Lambeth; Mrs. Lendall, Detroit; Mr. and Mrs. Marshall, Dorchester; Mrs. Evans, Hamilton; Mr. Martin, Woodstock; Mr. Knight, Woodstock; Mr. Karn, Woodstock; Mrs. Higgins, Toronto and Mrs. C. Pye, Clarksburg.

A GRAPHIC DESCRIPTION OF THE ACCIDENT.

Coming down from the uplands to the viaduct there is the down grade before mentioned. This decline is about three miles long before striking the bridge, and down it great speed is always attained, as is the case under similar circumstances on every road. When the express came along at six o'clock yesterday evening it must have been going at the rate of not less than 50 miles an hour, and very likely, nearly 60. A gentleman who lives in the neighborhood of the bridge told me to-day that had often timed the train at 60 miles an hour going down grade. The express does not stop at St. George station so there is no necessity for slacking up. A burst tire. Whirling along last night came the express. Just west of the station is a switch, just east of it another switch. When between these two Engineer Blackwell felt something give right under his feet. What that was nobody knows. About the same moment a piece of the tire of the right or south side driving wheel of the engine flew out. Past the station crashed the train with a roar and a rush and the tremendous whirling suction of an express under a full head of steam. Nobody saw the piece of metal fly. The engineer stood with his hand on the throttle calm but vigilant. Fifty yards past the station, and within 150 yards of the bridge, there came a terrible bump and the giant locomotive reeled as though struck in a vital part. The steel tire had sprung from its base and the cast iron wheel was smashing into fragments, while the tire whirled around independently with each stroke of the pistons. Great fragments of the broken wheel were flying in all directions, the engine was laboring like a ship at sea under stress of weather, rolling and groaning, when there came a report like the bang of a cannon, that sounded loud above the roar of the train. When fifty yards from the bridge the circling tire had burst its bounds by snapping the driving rod, and thus freed went spinning down the embankment, crashed through the fence, and now lies two hundred yards out in the field. It was just about this time that the locomotive left the rails. The ends of the broken driving rod, whirling about with each revolution, were working destruction at every stroke. A moment later and the train [illegible]d the bridge. Bumping along [illegible]e sleepers, the strain thrown [illegible] remaining driving rod proved [illegible]h and it also snapped. But [illegible] the other cars off the rail. There [illegible]e engine rushed on, the [illegible] like giants flails beating [illegible]re and hurling the

The [illegible] following [illegible]s before it is [illegible] rolled up [illegible] the great oak [illegible] as though [illegible] straw and were [illegible] mechanical winrow. [illegible] the propulsion [illegible]s end, and this [illegible] middle of the bridge [illegible] lumber was stuck fast. [illegible]alf of the train broke [illegible] its course. The Pullman and dining cars pang [illegible] the tremendous momentum [illegible] wild race down the [illegible], lifted the passenger [illegible] and hurled it clean over the bridge down to the depths below, where it fell crashing into the snow and earth, a complete wreck, entombing within it dead and dying and terribly injured. As the passenger coach was hurled aside the Pullman took its place, thrusting its nose into the mass of timber and wedging fast. But right here a new horrow eventuated. The girder of the preceding span, stripped on the middle beams, fell outwards and over the sides of the piers. Down through this gap fell the dining car, end foremost, the inmates crashed to the bottom under the weight of the seats and range and kitchen paraphernalia. About one-fourth of the Pullman overhang this gap, and in part dragged down by the dining car and in part unable to sustain its own weight, broke clean off and followed the other coaches in their sixty-five plunge. The engine's mad race. Meantime on rushed the engine, tearing everything out of its way, dragging the baggage coach and smoker after it, clear across the bridge and two hundred yards beyond before it stopped—a tangled wreck of rods and pipes and running gear. The two cars were terribly jolted but not wrecked.

FROZEN TO THE FENCE.—One of our townsmen reports being disturbed through the night by the unearthly screams of a cat. The morning dawned, he proceeded to investigate, and found that his catship had sat on the fence until his tail had been frozen to the boards, and for the time being he had become a fixture. Of course our townsman, being of a human disposition, liberated the unfortunate animal, but whether he cut the fence down and carried it in and placed it near the stove, or whither he built a fire on the fence around the cat to thaw him out, we have not learned.—[Dundalk Herald.

A Seven Days' Trip.

DEAR EDITOR.—Having just come home from a trip to Nottawasaga I thought a short description of it might be interesting to your readers.

I left here on the 15th of February and went by way of Singhampton to Creemore and visinity, having had a pleasant journey down, the roads being good, so that nothing of moment occurred. I went among my many friends, and can speak well of the hospitality of the Nottawasaga farmers. After enjoying myself for a few days I thought it was time to hie me home, so I prepared myself the night before for a start but in the morning when I arose to make my departure, I found the snow piled mountains high and still piling, so that it was impossible to do anything but remain quiet until the storm subside which took it some two or three days to expend its fury. I then thought I would make tracks for home, so I got my horse ready and started about 11 a.m. I took my way to Dunedin, a little village between two hills, with a dozen or two inhabitants, then turned up the 8th line of Nottawasaga and such a line, snow upon snow, mountains high, with no tracks, so we were forced to break our own roads with numerous upsets, which was not much relished by one of the fair daughters of one of the Nottawasaga farmers, who accompanied us to see some of the fair gents of Artemesia. Well at last we got up to Singhampton side road but found it no better and we had another time of breaking roads and upsets until we arrived at Singhampton where we got our dinners and then proceeded on our way, which was uneventful until we passed through Flesherton, and upon trying to reach home we found our way blocked, so we put our horse in comfortable quarters and after paying a friendly visit to friend McGill who was greatly taken up with our Nottawasaga friend, we proceeded down the track to our abode and were soon wrapped in peaceful slumbers and our trials were all over. Day Dreams.

(By the late Miss Jessie Baker, of York.)

We build ourselves a castle,
So noble, tall and fair;
We rear it to the heavens—
Our castle in the air.
We view its grand proportions,
We mark its lofty side,
And paint it in bright colors—
Ambition, love or pride.

The gilded sun of morning
Lights up the fairy spires,
The pinacles of rapture,
Acmes of our desires.
The blossoms of our fancy
Bloom round it fair and bright,
Imagination's tendrils
Festoon each pilar's height.

And never royal palace
Is guarded with more care,
Than is our chateau en Espagne
Our castle in the air.
It holds our dearest treasures,
Our hopes, our loves, our fears -
The yearnings we have cherished,
In secret, many years.

Youth's gaze is ever upward,
And so we seld- in know
On what a frail foundation
Our castles often grow.
A half-forgotten promise,
A word, a glance, a smile,
A tear or sigh perhaps, on which
Is reared the stately pile.

Strange that the things we love most
Are those which leave us first,
Strange that the gifts we have not
Are those for which we thirst
This loved child of our day dreams,
This shrine of treasures rare
Can it be doomed to perish?—
Our castle in the air.

A burst of careless laughter,
A sudden blast of scorn,
Turns sunshine into shadow,
Desolate and forlorn
Around us lies in ruins
What seemed to us most fair,
Dear to our hearts, yet blasted,
Our castle in the air.

Can all our beauteous visions—
Our mightiest thoughts and fair,
Be vanished lost forever -
Like cas tles in the air?
No. Phœnix like, from ashes
Let them arise again,
Making us truer women
And nobler, braver men

Good-Bye.

Love, love keeps ringing in my ears,
'Tis sweet and yet it gives me pain,
For what will it bring me, only tears,
You and I may never meet again.

We were strangers, yet when I saw your face
I know that you would be a friend,
That you in my heart would find a place
That I might trust you to the end.

'Tis sweet to meet kind loving friends,
But very sad with them to part,
For when I think of leaving them
It feels as though 'twould break my heart.

Now I must leave you, say good bye,
Leave England and friends so true,
'Twill be with many a tear and sigh
When I think of my old home and you.

But though I m far away from you
In lands far o'er the sea,
I shall often think of you my friend,
And hope that you'll think of me

ALICE M TAYLOR, Philadelphia, Pa.

What's the Use ?

If you meant to catch a robin,
And instead you get a crow,
Is there any use in whining,
In lamenting and repining,
Now I really want to know

If you thought you had an orange
And it proved a lemon sour,
Would it change the acid flavor
To a sweet and pleasant savor
If you scolded for an hour "

If a friend would prove unfaithful
That you thought was leal and true,
Can you win him back by fretting
At your comrades, quite forgetting
They have not played false to you

Will it ever lighten trouble,
Ever help you in disgrace,
Will it make you strong and able,
If you, like the man in fable,
Spoil your nose to spite your face

Sighing fills no purse with dollars;
Weeping neither mends nor mends,
If to day we court Dame Sorrow,
She will clasp us fast to morrow
While we search in vain for friends

So we'll keep our faces cheery;
We will crush our sorrows dumb,
And with strong hearts for life's burdens,
We will win sweet heaven's guerdons,
Taking each how'er they come.

ESTELLE'S INFATUATION:

A NOVEL.

"Yes," said Anne, who would have said "yes" to just the contrary proposition.

"It was the saddest pity when the first poor Mrs. Harford died," said Mrs. Aspline "If she had lived, she would not have let Conny marry that old major of hers"—a man just fifteen years older than his wife, and making the best husband to be found within the four seas "and if she had lived, this young Anthony would have been kept from ruin. The second wife was a poor creature, and cared only for her own."

"By-the-by, Anthony is not so very young, mother,' said Anne. "He is thirteen years older than I am."

"And you are over twenty?" asked her mother.

"Yes, last February; so that he is thirty-three."

"Old enough at all events to know better," said Mrs. Aspline

"He may not be quite so bad as we think,' said Anne, as a reflection rather than a remonstrance. "You see, we do not know anything against him, do we, mother? And he may not have been living with the Indians. All Americans do not."

"He cannot be worth much to have kept away in a half-civilized place like that for all these years," said Mrs. Aspline, a little severely. "You know they are not like us, Anne. They are not gentle-folks, like the English,"

"No, I know," said Anne. "But perhaps he has not forgotten all his English ways. He may not be so bad as the rest."

"Well, as you say, he may not," returned her mother, making the most of a concession which she could conscientiously make. "But I have always my doubts of young men who prefer foreign parts to home, and I have seen something of life by now."

"Yes," said Anne, with her customary air of non-combative submission, by which she never fought over differences of opinion, but always kept her own.

"I only hope he will make a good man of business if he decides on continuing my trustee," said her mother. "If not, I shall appoint another."

"Why not at first?" asked Anne.

"Well, no; I should scarcely like to do that without giving him a chance," replied Mrs. Aspline. "You see, Jack Harford was poor Mr. Aspline's best friend, and I would not like to throw a slight on his son all at once and without good grounds."

"No," said Anne; "that would not be fair."

And here the conversation came to a sudden standstill by the prosaic interruption of luncheon. Afterward, when Anne's customary siesta was over, the carriage, with its showy bays, and a drive through the village and so on to the moor, gave a new turn to their thoughts, and the ladies ceased to discuss Anthony Harford and his hypothetical misdemeanors. They turned instead to what was, on Mrs. Aspline's part, a rather acrimonious commentary on Lady Elizabeth's extraordinary craze for that dreadful lout, that Caleb Stagg. For the two were to be seen at some little distance off the main road, she on horse-back and he walking by her side, evidently in earnest conversation together.

"I consider it downright indecent," said Mrs. Aspline, a little hotly. "Such as Caleb Stagg is no fit companion for an earl's daughter, put it how you will, and Lady Elizabeth, good creature as she is, lets herself down too much."

"She has not quite enough pride," said Anne, who, for all her social admiration for Lady Elizabeth, thought, with her mother, she had a great deal too much condescension when it came to consorting with miners' sons.

"If the creature was tolerably well educated, I'd not be the one to say no," said Mrs. Aspline. "But such a thing as he is I would not take him to clean the boots and knives in my house! And here is an earl's daughter as thick as thieves with him! And his father only a miner, and his mother a pit-brow lass."

"He is not fit company for her," said Anne. "It is far better when people stay in their own class."

"Far," said her mother. Then she "remembered herself," as she would have phrased it, and her peony-like cheeks grew a yet livelier red. "Now, there is myself," she went on to say, answering her own thought. "I was a poor officer's daughter"—he had been color-sergeant; but let that pass—"so, of course I was a lady. But when poor papa died I had to go out and get my own living, as we all had. I was lady house-keeper till your father took a fancy to me and married me." Oh, Cookey! Cookey! Thou who dished up those nice little dinners which warmed the cockles of Mr. Aspline's heart, so that he made the concocter thereof his lawful wife! "But even I hold myself not quite equal to the rest, because I had to work for my living. And that is always against a lady."

"It should not be," said Anne, with dutiful care.

"It is, though," said her mother. "But, Lord alive, if I am not quite the tip-top thing, what is this this trash?" she exclaimed, with real passion.

"No; what, indeed?" said Anne.

"And consorting there with Lady Elizabeth as if he was her lap-dog!" cried Mrs. Aspline.

"It is a pity," said Anne.

And then she blushed a little ruefully, and wished that her mother had not spoken quite so vehemently, for Lady Elizabeth was so good—and being an earl's daughter she was justified in any eccentricity is pleased her to commit.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE ANGEL OF HEALING.

Lady Elizabeth had been from home, and it was during her absence that the sorry chapter of history already recorded had been transacted between Caleb and Estelle.

Sorry as she was for the pain that had flowed like a river of bitterness among them all, she would not condemn not even poor, distracted, worldly minded Mrs. Cianricarde, who honestly held the arrangement of her daughter's rich marriage as a mother's most pressing duty, and who had thus acted only according to her lights when she had offered Estelle to Caleb Stagg.

Thinking of all these things, and full of care and perplexity for those she loved, and whose sorrows she had made her own, Lady Elizabeth had turned her horse's head toward the moor, and was now cantering briskly over its breezy breadth, when she saw poor Coleb moving mournfully among the gorse and heather, thinking he was looking for plants and creatures, as was his wont, but not seeing them the broad-leaved sun-dew at his feet, not conscious that the lark was singing overhead, nor that the sun was shining down on the earth like that song translated into glory. He was conscious of nothing that was about him. He was thinking only of Estelle; of the difficulties of her position with her mother; of their pecuniary entanglements; of the hopelessness of her love for Charlie Osborne, and his own inability to help her.

When Lady Elizabeth saw him she rode on to the moor and came up to him. Even at the distance at which he was she could see something of his grief.

He started when she drew up, leaning from her saddle and offering him her hand.

"Lady Elizabeth! Ah! but I am main glad to see you!" cried Caleb, with simple fervor.

"I recognized you from the road, and came across to speak to you," said the ady.

"Thank you, Lady Elizabeth," he answered. "That was kind of you. But then you always are kind, Lady Elizabeth."

"Not more so than others," she said, with a smile.

"I think so," he returned, with that humble kind of gratitude which means so much suffering and pain. "There is only one Lady Elizabeth Inchbold in the world," he added, simply.

"Have you learned to flatter during my absence?" she asked, trying to speak lightly.

"Nay," he answered, very sadly, looking into the distance in that far-off way which shows a mastery of preoccupation the very reverse of flattering. "I have learned nothing so pleasant, Lady Elizabeth. I have learned only pain since you left."

"I am sorry for that," she returned, knowing well what he meant.

"I have missed you, Lady Elizabeth," he then said, looking into her face. "When you go away it is as if you somehow took my guardian angel along with you. Things go all to wrongs with me, and I feel as if I had lost my compass to steer by."

"Have they been going wrong?" she asked. "I am sorry to hear that."

"Ay, that they have!" he answered. "I am not one to cry out if my finger aches, and I think that the most of us get in the world much as we deserve; but sometimes life is hard, and one scarce knows which road to take. All seem to lead to muck and mire alike!"

The round red-lidded eyes filled up with tears, and the loose clumsy mouth quivered.

"For the moment only," said Lady Elizabeth, softly. "The darkest cloud, you know, has its silver lining. Surely no symbol is truer, none more cheering!"

"So they say, and maybe it is true; but to be offered a crown that will not fit, and to hold in your hand a dove that will not bide—to have a palace for your soul that is naught but a cloud, and that fades away as you look—it's long looking for the silver lining there!" he said, a little passionately and more despairingly. "And that's what has come to me, Lady Elizabeth, since you left your home!"

"I am grieved it has all happened so," she said. "I was afraid it would from what she told me, and from what I saw the mother wished. And I knew she would not consent. How could she? Ask yourself, Mr. Stagg, how could she?"

"Nay, as you say, Lady Elizabeth, how could she!" he repeated, the ellipses fully intelligible to each. "She had no choice but to say me nay; and I was a fool for letting myself dream of aught different."

"If you had thought—if you had reflected," said the lady, gently.

"Yes, yes, I know," he answered, humbly. "But, believe me, Lady Elizabeth, I would not have given in, for I know her value and myself too well, but that I was so sore tempted."

"You must forgive even her who caused you all this needless pain," said Lady Elizabeth, gently. "Poor woman! She is just distracted with anxiety, and does not know which way to turn. And she might have deceived herself. Her very desire that this thing should come to pass might have made her believe it possible. Our own hopes and wishes do deceive us so much!"

"But she could only desire it for the sake of father's money," said Caleb, without bitterness or excitement, simply stating a fact. "I knew it all along; but I hoped, as fools will."

"They are in great straits," said Lady Elizabeth. "Mr. Cianricarde has made an unlucky speculation, and lost almost all they had."

"And I have nothing of my own," said Caleb; "and not a trade at my finger's ends to make anything by. If I had thousands I would give her to the last farthing, and be proud that I had been able to helpher."

"I am sure of that," said Lady Elizabeth, looking at him with eyes as soft as a dove's, for surely a fairer soul than this of the ungainly omad'haun's was never lodged in human body; and friendship does not demand beauty of person nor grace of manner, as does love. It demands mainly goodness and the assurance of stability; and of these Caleb had large possession. "And indeed," she added, still those soft dove-like eyes on his, "the only way in which we can forget our own pain is by sympathy with others—losing self in unselfishness."

"Yes," said Caleb.

"And we are only good according to our trials," she continued. "It is easy to be generous and unselfish and all that if we are not put to the test. Then how we bear ourselves decides our worth."

"Yes," said Caleb again.

"And nursing unavailing sorrow is but a poor way,' she said, still so gentle, but so direct.

"That is it," he sighed.

"And jealousy is even a worse," she said.

"Ay, that is it!" was his reply.

Then there was a short pause between them, when Lady Elizabeth said, rather suddenly: "Of course the best thing would be if Mr. Osborne would marry as soon as possible, and so, at least, save Estelle."

Caleb blenched just a trifle.

"Yes," he said, a little huskily.

"I do not see how that can be, however," the lady continued, "for he does not make money. He does not sell his pictures well, and those are the best things he does. I am always hoping his luck will turn, for he is really very clever, and his work is above the average."

"I am no judge, Lady Elizabeth," said Caleb, still husky in spite of his efforts, and finding speech difficult.

"No," she answered, "perhaps not; but, take it from me, they deserve more recognition than they get. However, I hope I have done him some good. A very rich man I met with when I was in London a Mr. Smythe Smith is going to have his new house in Piccadilly painted in the modern style of continuous decoration"—Caleb made his round eyes rounder than ever—"that is, the rooms are to be painted, some with birds and some with flowers, and some with figures and landscapes, and things like that—the walls, you know; not papered, but painted like pictures."—"Oh," said Caleb. "And I recommended him to employ Charlie Osborne. It would be a costly matter, and Charlie would make a very good thing of it, and perhaps that would be a nest-egg for his marriage."

"That was kind," said Caleb, turning away his head. There are times when the soul would fain hide itself even from its guardian angel!

"But I do not know when Mr. Smythe Smith's house will be ready for decoration," continued Lady Elizabeth; "and, meantime, something ought to be done."

"Yes," said Caleb.

A sudden thought seemed to strike his friend. She looked at this homely face before her, still a little averted, looked as if measuring something in her own mind. So she was. She was measuring the extent of Caleb Stagg's unselfishness and nobleness. Then she spoke.

"I wonder if your father would like such a room at Redhill?" she said. "Does he care for modern fashions? Would he care for a decorated room in the new style?"

"I don't know," said Caleb, after a pause. "He might." He could scarcely speak, and his face was ashen pale.

"And you?" said Lady Elizabeth. "You would not oppose it if your father liked the idea?"

Over that pale face passed a spasm of acute pain. Then a sudden rush of blood made the rose in Lady Elizabeth's breast pale by contrast.

"No," he said, firmly. "I would try to persuade father to have it. It would be to her good!"

"God bless you! God bless you!" said Lady Elizabeth, fervently, laying her hand on Caleb's shoulder, and looking into his face with eyes that were as caress on his "You are as I thought you were, Mr. Stagg—a true, good, noble-hearted man, and one of whose friendship I am proud."

"Do not say that, Lady Elizabeth," he answered, humbly. "What else could I do when I love her, and she is not for me?"

It was just at this juncture that Mrs. Aspline saw these two apparently mismatched associates, and pronounced with so much asperity on their friendship. But then that is the way in which the world always judges things unknown; and to condemn does raise one a few inches higher in one's own estimation, and so pleasantly smoothes down the Pharisaical silk within us!

Soon after this Lady Elizabeth rode off to the Dower House, where she ought to have been an hour ago; and Caleb trudged back over the moor and on to Redhill, where he was eager to fasten the knot which good resolve had tied. He resolutely fixed his mind on Estelle and her joy; and more than once he had to clear his eyes of their gathering mists when he pictured her sweet face smiling into his and her soft hands held out to him as she thanked him for his help.

"And maybe then she will give me a warm thought and take me into her heart," he thought. "God bless her! the Lord love her! ay, at any cost to myself!"

"God bless that good, honest fellow!" said Lady Elizabeth, half aloud, as she rode along the lanes, and thought of that unlovely omad'haun as the hero he was, and saw how shapely was the spirit which inhabited so ungainly a form.

CHAPTER XV.

PROFFERED MANNA.

Lady Elizabeth's scheme of finding work for Charlie Osborne by painting the walls of the great drawing-room at Redhill was hugely approved of by Miles Stagg when the thing was proposed by Caleb, who half doubted his father's consent.

"Nay, I care naught for fashion," he said, with a big fat laugh, when Caleb shot his first bolt from behind the shelter of his stalking-horse. "I m not much of a fashion man myself; but what her ladyship says is right to me; and what she says ought to be done, where I'm captain of the gang, or I'll know the reason why. If she likes to have the walls all a-painted with dicky birds and turnip tops, it's all one to me so long as she is suited. It's for her eyes in the long-run, not mine, I reckon, and the long-run has most claim."

Then he chuckled and grew red in the face for joy of his dancing light-limbed thoughts. He had made up his mind that Lady Elizabeth Inchbold was to be his daughter-in-law. What to her were the walls of the great drawing-room at Redhill unless she had it in view to spend her life in looking at them?

The father consented with his broad Pantagruelistic humor, but the mother opposed a feeble, fatuous negative. She hadn't so much strength in her arms and back as she used to have, and she would be sorry to see good things like theirs spoiled with mishandling. And she thought the walls did well enough with the paper that was on them, now that it was there. It had cost a powerful sight of money when it was first put up, and it was as good as new.

So she objected in her maundering, monotonous way, till Miles came down on her with a heavy back-hander, after which, poor soul, she subsided with sniffles and silence on the sofa, and the voice of her complaining was heard no more in the land.

Her opposition had, however, its customary effect of strengthening Miles in his resolve. He had not taken a bankrupt mine in faith on his broad shoulders, and made his fortune in consequence, to be crossed by his own wife. Let her mind her own business, and he would mind his, he said; and if he chose to give her the finest drawing-room in the county, that was his doing, not hers. All that she had to do was to take what was given her, and make no bones about it, else he'd soon let her see who was master; and now she knew!

These scenes were too frequent to cause much commotion when they occurred.

Caleb was ordered to write now at once to Mr Charles Osborne to offer him the job at his own valuation. Miles did not care what it cost, and it might go into the hundreds or into the thousands for what he had a mind.

It was a difficult letter for Caleb to write. Looked at in any light he would, it was a main sore task. He was not fond of writing letters at any time—no man with his upbringing is—but to write Charlie Osborne, who held himself as high as Lord Eustace or the earl himself, who loved that beautiful star of his life and light of his dreams, and who was in turn loved by her to write to him offering that what Miles called this job that he might be well paid, and so brought nearer to the goal of his desire—yes, in any way and in all ways it was a difficult thing to do for one so painfully conscious as Caleb Stagg; and the sheets of good note paper he spoiled by unfit beginnings, uncomfortable endings, and imperfect middles, would have made poor Nancy's grizzled hair stand on end in horror at the waste, had she seen it. At last however, the tortured scribe got the thing done; and after all his false starts wrote what he might have written at the outset -a simple, plain, unaffected proposal, based on Lady Elizabeth's recommendation.

When he received this letter, Charlie Osborne exploded first into laughter and then into wrath. The gentleman in him revolted at the thought of working for Miles Stagg's pleasure; and his pride took fire when he realized the indignity of taking money from such a brute. He, Charlie Osborne, to be indebted to a coarse, rude miner for the means of living—to be paid by him as he had once been paid by his employers; he a gentleman, and his employer a boor of the lowest kind! He got up and looked at himself in the glass, pulling down his coat skirt, and settling his collar and cravat. It was a curiously instinctive movement—the half-unconscious expression of his very conscious pride—for few families of long descent are more conscious of superiority of condition than are the sons and daughters of the country clergy. Their place is one of moral influence; they have direct authority in schools and choirs, and in other matters as well; their example is [illegible] worthy, and they are under the same [illegible]cement to behave well as are the [illegible]ally aristocratic—the father's [illegible]ding for family traditions. To the [illegible] with whom their business chiefly lies, [illegible] noble as the noblest; and as all [illegible]ife are relative—social superiority [illegible]e rest the clergyman's son [illegible]belted knight, the local squire an[illegible] stand equally high in their several places—which is all that is wanted to insure the feeling of relative equality.

Hence Charlie Osborne, though only a poor artist who must work to live, as the son of a gentleman and himself a gentleman, held himself in his right to break into sardonic laughter, passing on to wrath, when he received Caleb's letter and realized its conditions.

Tempest-tossed, revolted, passionate, inflamed, he debated within himself all that evening, and carried the thought like a fire in his brain through all the night, and in the morning had come to no definite decision, no absolute assertion of yea or nay. He, too, wrote and destroyed half a dozen letters, some accepting, some refusing; and then suddenly decided on going in person to Redhill. He should be better able to judge when he had seen the place; and if there were capabilities, perhaps it was his duty to utilize them. One never knows where one may not do good; and he should be sorry if he had neglected an opportunity for spreading the religion of true taste. Whereat, warmed by this sudden outblaze of artistic philanthropy, Charlie took his hat and sketching-book, and walked off to Redhill to interview his would-be patrons.

When he came to the house and was ushered into the great drawing-room his heart sank and his disgust swelled. It was revolting to see this mingled mass of magnificence and hideousness, pitiable to note the inharmoniousness, the incongruity, everywhere alike. Over the house and the inmates, and in every fact and circumstance, reigned the same barbarous confusion and inartistic misfit—the same crying want of taste and almost profligate expenditure. How could he throw his soul on to such a rag heap? Fancy painting a frieze of stately peacocks for people of execrable design, where simpering sylph, with mauve-colored flesh, ogled a lumpish Cupid, all knobs as if made out of apples—sylph and Cupid repeated a dozen times in a couple of breadths, with the same eternal bouquet and sprawling garland of red and blue and yellow flowers, bright enough to give a sensitive brain inflammation on the spot! What would such people think of a dead gold ground behind delicate traceries of maidenhair ferns where not two fronds were alike? What would they say to a dado of ebony inlaid with mother-of-pearl and "pietra dura" in arabesques and stiff conventionalized geometrical forms?

And he was thinking this when the door burst open with a rude kind of bang, and Miles Stagg, with Caleb and Nancy at his heels, came noisily into the room

"Well, Mr. Osborne, sir, so you're taking stock, are ye?" shouted Miles, in that way he had as if speaking to a deaf world

"I was looking at your room," returned Charlie, glacially polite.

"It's Lady Elizabeth's whim," laughed Miles, showing all his teeth; "and we're bound to follow my lady's lead—ain't we Caleb lad?" slapping his son's shoulder.

"I'd like to do as Lady Elizabeth wishes," said Caleb, stiffly meaning rebuke; and Charlie, who was what the Scotch call "gleg at the uptak," wondered what the deuce was underneath this odd jocularity and constrained reply.

"Well," said Miles, after a pause, "and what may you be thinking of the job, Mr. Osborne? Cost's no question." He visibly swelled with pride as he said this, his thumbs in his waistcoat pockets, and his big coarse fingers playing a jubilant tattoo on the flaring flowers of the embroidered satin. "I've enough and to spare for my lady's fancies, and thy work, my lad"—here he lapsed into ordinary familiarity of tone—"and thou'lt not put a wrong price, were it ever so."

THE PROVINCIAL EXHIBITION.

Mr. Awrey's Motion Discussed in the Legislature Wednesday.

THE SHOW STANDS FOR ANOTHER YEAR.

In the Ontario Legislature, after routine, Wednesday,

Mr. Awrey moved the resolution that has been standing in his name since the 1st January. The House was full and the resolution brought on quite an interesting debate. It was as follows:

That this House, recognizing that the Provincial Exhibition has in the past proved of no little service to the interests of agriculture; that the work it has hitherto done is now being more efficiently done by the exhibitions held in our large cities, that in view of the fact that the Provincial Exhibition has proved a financial failure year after year, aggregating a loss during the past seven years of no less a sum than ten thousand dollars, and that it meets each year with but indifferent support; that the large cities refuse to give to it their show grounds for exhibition purposes; that property belonging to the Province, held in trust by the Board of Agriculture, has been mortgaged to meet yearly deficits; that the Board of Agriculture released a lien of four thousand dollars held upon the property of the Western Fair Association, and have agreed to give the association a grant of one thousand dollars in addition thereto for the privilege of holding their exhibitions in the city of London every fourth year, and that such indications of the unpopularity of the Provincial Exhibition are not creditable to the Province—is of opinion that it would now be justified in refusing to give any further grants for the purpose of holding a Provincial Exhibition under the direction and management of the Board of Agriculture.

In speaking to his resolution, Mr. Awrey repudiated any lack of sympathy with or respect for those who had hitherto had the conduct of the affairs of the Provincial Exhibition. The action he was taking was not from any hostility to the members of the Agriculture and Arts Association, but from an honest conviction that the great good accomplished by the agency of the Exhibition in years past had been overcast by the disappointments of the past few years. He had made a careful study of the history of the Province in its connection with the history of the Provincial Exhibition. It was a most interesting study. The growth of the Province was of a nature to reflect great credit upon the people of Ontario, and the origination and development of the Provincial Exhibition had been intimately connected therewith. The hon. member then proceeded to discuss the origin and growth of the Exhibition. This part of his speech was full of interesting facts and figures, and was treated in a very able manner. The first Exhibition was held in 1844, at the city of Toronto, and so scarce was then the stock of the Province, and so difficult the means of approaching Toronto, that the total of entries of exhibits amounted only to 1,150 in all classes, or less than the number of entries at the average successful township fair at the present time. The total expenditure was but $1,100. Mr. Awrey gave a good idea of the interest taken in the Exhibition at the time, notwithstanding its meagre appearance in the light of subsequent successes, by quoting from contemporary journals a description of the manner in which people locked in to it, coming from miles around, on foot, on horseback, in lumber waggons, and in every conceivable fashion. Then, taking the Exhibition year by year Mr. Awrey showed how it had grown in importance, and year by year with it the agriculture of the Province had been developed. Statistics were given to show the extraordinary increase of population, cultivated acres, horses, cattle, swine, etc., The increase of the prosperity of the Exhibition continued up to 1881, but, said Mr. Awrey, after that date its usefulness might be said to have gradually declined. He did not say that this was owing to the management in any way. It was their misfortune and due to the fact that the people of Ontario failed any longer to support the exhibition. The hon. member showed that for the five years ending in 1887 there was an accumulated deficit of $7,000 on the Provincial Exhibition. There was no question as to its being a financial failure. That argument might be met by the reply that it was an educator were it not for the numerous other exhibitions now held in the small as well as the great centres of population. The press of the Province, Mr. Awrey argued, was a unit against the continuance of the annual grant. The Exhibition was not welcomed anywhere. It had to beg its way from city to city and it was high time to put an end to it, only, seeing what use it once was to the Province, he wanted to see it die decently. (Laughter and applause.)

Mr. Bronson moved in amendment an addition asking that the sum hitherto devoted to the Provincial Exhibition should be divided among the annual fairs of London, Hamilton, Kingston and Ottawa.

The amendment was negatived without a division.

Hon. Mr. Drury had no fault to find with Mr. Awrey's general conclusions, but contented himself with pointing out that last year the Government had contracted an engagement with the city of London, which was substantially that the Provincial Exhibition should be held there in the fall of 1889. Under these circumstances the Government had placed $10,000, as usual, in the estimates. Of this sum, $6,000 would be used for purposes other than that of the exhibition. He suggested the amendment of the resolution so that it should not apply to the year 1889. Aside from this, there was no objection to the resolution on the part of the Government. If the exhibition had to be buried, let it be buried at London. Laughter and applause.)

Mr. Awrey thought there was no reason why he should not accept the amendment if the facts were as stated by the Minister of Agriculture and allow the Exhibition to be held one year more and buried thus at London.

Mr. Bishop, whose name had been given as the seconder of the original resolution, rose at this point, and amid some ironical laughter from the Opposition, said he knew there was a "nigger in the fence" somewhere. He protested against Mr. Awrey's allowing his resolution to be changed, and said he would not take the responsibility of seconding it in its amended shape.

Thereupon Hon. Mr. Fraser moved, seconded by Hon. Mr. Drury, the amendment of the original resolution by taking out the words "would now be justified," in the latter part of the resolution, and substituting the words "will be justified in refusing after the present year."

Mr. Waters thought it would be better for the Provincial Exhibition to lie quiet after the present year for a while; but he was as firmly convinced as that he stood there that the time would come when it would be called back, when the people would become tired of the sideshows of the present exhibitions, and welcome back an exhibition conducted with the simplicity of the old Provincial. Taking figures published in the morning papers concerning the annual meeting of the Toronto Industrial Exhibition, held on the preceding day, Mr. Waters compared the financial statistics connected with it with those in connection with the Provincial, and claimed that the financial management of the latter, according to those figures, seemed to compare very favorably with that of the former.

The reference to sideshows pained Mr. H. E. Clarke, and he rose and made a very able defence of the same, contending that sideshows relieved the tension of the average visitor to exhibitions, just as a student's mind was relieved by the reading of a novel after long study. Those who didn't like sideshows could keep away from them.

Mr. Whitney could not agree that the Provincial Exhibition had lost its usefulness. The only real argument used by Mr. Awrey against it, he said, was that it did not pay, and he (Mr. Whitney) would dispose of that by pointing out that the Guelph Agricultural College did not pay and was not expected to do so, and yet nobody proposed to abolish it. Also lunatic asylums were not paying institutions, and yet it was not proposed to abolish them.

Mr. Meredith was inclined in part to agree with the last speaker that the usefulness of the Provincial Exhibition was not all gone yet; at the same time, he supposed it must bow to the storm at the present time. He agreed with the mover of the resolution that if the Exhibition was to be buried a better place than London could not be found, and a more melodious voice than that of Mr. Awrey to sing its requiem could not be listened to.

Mr. Metcalfe thought that the Exhibition should not be allowed to die because no arguments were adduced to show that it does not act as an educator in the eastern portion of the Province.

Hon. A. M. Ross argued that looking on the Exhibition as a purely business arrangement the proposition of the Minister of Agriculture that the grant should be given this year was the best in the interests of all parties.

Hon. Mr. Drury rose again to say that the Exhibition did not die because it was not patronized by the public, but because it was difficult to get sufficient accommodation for it in the cities in which it was held.

Mr. Graham found fault with the management, stating that the secretary controlled the directors instead of the directors controlling him.

Mr. Awrey replied to the speakers who found fault with him for consenting to the amendment, concluding by saying "that he did so because the Minister of Agriculture and the leader of the Opposition stated that the honor of the House was pledged to the Exhibition being again held in London."

Mr. Wood (Hastings) would vote for the amendment, but preferred the original.

Mr. Stratton was opposed to the Exhibition and regretted that the motion of the member for South Wentworth could not, under the circumstances, be pressed on the House.

Mr. Phelps would rather see London get the $4,000 than hold the Exhibition there next year.

Hon. Mr. Fraser's amendment to continue the Exhibition a year longer was then voted upon and carried on a division by 59 to 17.

AN ASTONISHED MAIDEN.

How a Swell Friend Put His Foot in it With a Vengeance.

A Washington despatch says: All Washington is splitting its sides to-day over a story of social romance and misadventure which has just leaked out. Mr. George Barclay, of the British Legation, has of late been sufficiently epris of Miss Leiter, the beautiful Western heiress, who has turned all Washington heads this winter. Mr. Barclay is the attractive young gentleman who won fame and money at the Knickerbocker Club in New York by backing himself to drive to the Brunswick Hotel, dress for dinner and return inside of ten minutes. He did actually accomplish this feat inside of seven minutes. It is undoubtedly owing to this nervous haste, abnormally developed in an otherwise rather slow nature, that Mr. Barclay has now to accept his present mortification. It seems that on Wednesday night Mr. Barclay felt the approach of the cold wave and purchased some of those warm woollen garments which stick closer than a brother to a cold man's legs. The same afternoon he ordered a box of roses to be sent to his lodgings. Late for dinner, as usual, he rushed home, dashed off a pretty note to Miss Leiter, saying, "Wear these this evening for my sake," and handed the note and the box containing the woollen goods to his servant, who duly delivered them, while the box of roses remained upon Mr. Barclay's table. Although perhaps not quite so grievous an international affront as Lord Sackville put upon us, the views of the British Foreign Office upon this latest misfit in diplomacy are awaited with some amusement and anxiety. As for Mr. Barclay's personal explanations, they are, of course, unmentionable.

PIGOTT AND THE LETTERS.

Examination of the Man Who Supplied the Epistles.

SOMEWHAT STARTLING REVELATIONS.

A last (Thursday) night's London cable says: Upon the reassembling of the Parnell Commission to-day Richard Pigott was again called for examination. He testified that while he was in Paris in April, 1866, he was accosted on the street by a man giving the name of Morris Murphy, who said he had been a compositor in witness' employ. He did not recognize the man, but saw no reason to doubt his statement. They conversed and subsequently met again, when Murphy stated that he had not been able to ascertain anything about the documents. Witness said he wanted an article on the League. A week later Murphy said he had found the documents in a bag. He described the bag and said it contained five or six of Egan's letters, some of Parnell's and some old accounts. Witness said he was authorized to find the documents and asked the price for their surrender. Murphy at first wanted £1,000, but afterwards said he would take £500. The next day Murphy showed witness the bag and its contents. Witness read the letters and made memoranda, but did not actually copy the letters. Pigott here identified six letters of Egan's, five of Parnell's, including the letter a fac simile of which appeared in the Times, and scraps of accounts which were produced in court, as the contents of the bag.

Pigott said he believed the signatures attached to the letters were those of Parnell. He had no idea as to who wrote the body of the letters. Witness returned to England, and Houston, having promised to pay the sum demanded for the letters, witness went again to Paris. Murphy then said agents of the Clan-na-Gael claimed the letters, and it would be necessary to go to New York to get authority from the heads of that Order. Witness, after consulting with Houston, went to New York. Murphy gave witness a letter to Breslin, who stated he had received a despatch from Paris instructing him to meet witness. Breslin gave witness a sealed letter for Murphy. Witness started back and handed the letter to Murphy, who said it was all right, but explained he could not give up the letters until he had seen other people. Two evenings later Murphy took witness to a private room in a cafe, where five men were seated. These, he said, represented the Clan-na-Gael. He made witness swear on a Catholic prayer-book that under no circumstances would he reveal the source from which he obtained the documents. Witness also swore that he would not mention names and if any proceedings followed the publication of the letters that he would not testify. Witness detailed the purchase of the letters and Murphy's offer to repurchase them, corroborating Houston's testimony. Witness had nothing to do directly or indirectly with writing the letters. "The suggestion that I forged them is quite untrue," he said. Witness knew Egan's writing and was convinced Egan wrote the letters ascribed to him. Murphy was displeased with the refusal to return the letters. Witness saw Hayes, President of the I. R. B., and Casey, a Fenian, in Paris.

Sir Charles Russell objected to evidence as to what passed between Hayes and Casey and witness.

After a long wrangle, Mr. Davitt said he had seen Casey and Hayes in Paris since the appointment of the commission.

Pigott said he first heard of the other letters at the beginning of 1888. His informant was Thomas Brown, of the Clan-na-Gael. Hayes introduced Brown and witness in Paris. Brown produced the letters, and witness sent Houston copies of two of Parnell's letters and one of Egan's. Pigott had not the slightest doubt that the signatures were genuine. In July, 1888, he heard of other letters. A person in Paris, who declined to reveal his name, surrendered them for £200, of which witness received £50 back. Pigott denied that he forged any part of the second or third batch of letters.

Pigott continued: "A man named O'Brien visited me in Dublin under the alias of Sinclair. He said Parnell sent him to get me to assist Egan. Mr. Labouchere, he said, would pay me a high price if I had any letter of Parnell's to sell. Sinclair suggested that I should see Labouchere in London and gave me £5 to pay my passage." Witness told how he went to London, where he had an interview with Parnell and Labouchere. Pigott said Parnell told him he had prima facie evidence that witness had forged the letters, and Labouchere proposed that witness admit the forgery. Lewis entered and said that if witness failed to obey instructions Lewis would prosecute him mercilessly for perjury and forgery. Afterwards witness saw Labouchere alone. Labouchere said he was prepared to pay £1,000, but money matters must not be mentioned to Parnell. Witness induced Labouchere to think he would accede, but on returning to the room he said nothing would induce him to swear the letters were forgeries. Lewis then asked witness to write to the Times that he believed the letters to be forgeries, when the Times would withdraw them. Witness asked for time to consider. Lewis on the next day told witness that Labouchere's offer would hold good if witness induced the Times to withdraw the letters.

Attorney-General Webster read Lewis' notes of the interview. Witness challenged their accuracy and denied having said he believed the letters were not genuine. On another day witness accidentally met Parnell and Lewis. The latter denied that he gave witness any assurance. Parnell's manner was hesitating. He reiterated that witness had forged the letters and also accused him of having committed mercantile forgeries. Witness denied this and said he courted the fullest inquiry.

Attorney-General Webster read a long correspondence between Pigott and Lewis. In his letter Lewis averred that he and his associates were aware Pigott was a forger before they saw him. He suggested that Pigott meet Parnell again. Pigott replied that he was prepared to meet any proceedings, and he declined to meet Parnell again. Witness said Labouchere repeatedly wrote, pressing him to testify and offering to pay his passage. At the end of January he received a letter containing £10. He was anxious to avoid testifying. He was aware that it was dangerous to offend the Clan-na-Gael, and he might be murdered.

At Sir Charles Russell's request, Pigott wrote the words "livelihood," "likelihood," "Richard Pigott," "proselytism," "Patrick Egan," "P. Egan" and "hesitancy." Pigott said he corresponded with Mr. Forster from 1881 to 1884. He did not write to Earl Spencer in 1873 offering information for money. He wrote to Sir G. O. Trevelyan, asking for money on account of his support of the Government. He denied that in his statement to Lewis he said the publication of the letters by the Times alarmed him and he had asked Archbishop Walsh to place him in communication with Parnell in order to expose the forgeries. He denied that he knew that the articles on "Parnellism and Crime" were being prepared.

Sir Charles Russell produced a letter from Pigott to Archbishop Walsh, dated March 4th, 1887, and marked "private and confidential." In this letter Pigott said he knew that proceedings were contemplated with the object of destroying the Parnellite's influence in Parliament. The proceedings would consist of the publication of statements tending to show complicity in crime of Parnell and his colleagues. He assured the Archbishop that he wrote with a full knowledge of these designs, and could indicate how they could be defeated. Sir Charles Russell pressed witness to explain how these designs could have been defeated if the letters were genuine.

Pigott replied that he did not recollect what changes were meant, and did not recollect the letter at all. He could not have had the Parnell letters in mind when he wrote to the Archbishop.

Sir Charles then read the postscript to the letter as follows: "I need hardly say that did I consider the parties really guilty I should not dream that your Grace would partake in an effort to shield them. My only wish is to press upon your Grace that the evidence is apparently convincing and probably sufficient to secure a conviction by an English jury."

Pigott reiterated that the Parnell letters were not in his mind when he wrote the postscript. He never thought the letters in themselves constituted a serious charge. He asked for the Archbishop's reply, which Sir Charles produced. Pigott, after inspecting the Archbishop's letter, said he believed he never received it.

The commission then adjourned.

A last (Friday) night's London cable says: The court was crowded again today when the Parnell Commission reassembled. The cross-examination of Pigott was continued. He admitted writing a letter to Archbishop Walsh, which Sir Charles Russell produced, and which contained a statement that the documentary evidence to be produced before the Commission could be rendered harmless by an exposure of the means by which it was obtained. Archbishop Walsh's letter to Pigott, part of which was read yesterday was read in extenso. The Archbishop referred to the fact that there had been systematic lying concerning the Nationalist cause. The witness now admitted receiving this letter. He said that when he wrote to the Archbishop he was in very distressed circumstances, owing to having received no money from Houston. Witness' other work had been neglected and lost. He therefore wrote to Archbishop Walsh, hoping he would submit the matter to the Parnellite members of Parliament and induce them to provide witness with means to leave the country in return for information witness should give. Witness was startled when the letters appeared in the Times and considered it a breach of faith. He wrote to Houston strongly protesting against their publication.

Sir Charles demanded that this letter be produced. Houston said he had forgotten receiving it.

On being pressed, Pigott exclaimed: "I may say at once that the statements I made to Archbishop Walsh were unfounded.' This statement produced a sensation.

Sir Charles Russell—You deliberately wrote lies'

Witness—Well exaggerations.

Sir Charles—Did the exaggerations have no truth'

Witness—Very little. (Laughter.) I forget what I meant when I wrote to Archbishop Walsh that the charges were a mixture of what I believed to be true and untrue.

Witness said he knew criminal proceedings were projected when he wrote saying he could nullify them by exposing the discreditable means by which it was sought to institute proceedings. He could not say what the proceedings were to be taken for. He imagined they were for complicity in the Phœnix Park murders, but there was no foundation for the statement. Witness again wrote to Archbishop Walsh on May 1st, offering to furnish further information. In reply, the Archbishop said: "I understand you are anxious to make a statement to assist the victims of fraud and slander by exposing the fraud and slander. I cannot refuse to accept such a statement fully. I accept your assurance that you took no part in the publication."

Witness said he forgot writing the statement.

The Commission then adjourned.

A Queer Deposit in a Bank.

A despatch from Kingston says that the bank vault at Cape Vincent, N. Y., which passed through the ordeal of the recent fire, preserved its contents untouched. Among the possessions which had been consigned to its safe keeping were a box of matches and 780 lbs. of opium. The presence of the latter commodity in such quantity in a bank vault seems rather a strange occurrence. It is said to have been placed there by the customs officials, who seized it the other day.

"The Time is Great."

(Spanish Gypsy.)

The time is great! Let us not waste our days,
Those slender links in the strong chain of life
That binds the past and future, making time
One great eternity of endless years
That boundless stretch behind us and before.

The time is great! Who has not felt the thrill
That vibrates through the world from pole to pole,
Quickening earth's children to a deeper life?
They waken from their sleep of centuries,
Forget their petty aims, their selfish cares,
As did their ancestors, the great of old,
And, one by one, new-baptized in the light,
Do reverence to the universal soul,
Of past and present born, king of all time,
All men, all actions great and small.

The time is great, and great the hope for man;
He's caught a glimpse of his great destiny.
New prophets preach the truth with words of fire,
And heroes die for justice once again;
The brooding hush of expectation yields
To the fierce noise of conflict or the shout
Of victory assured, and martyrs know
The felon's scaffold is a kingly throne
Whereon sits Truth to sway and rule the world.

The time is great. What! look ye to the thrones,
Where "Mene, Mene" on their palace walls,
Cause crowned heads to tremble once again,
For heroes? Look not there. 'Tis not from them,
But from the million toilers of the earth
Shall come the heroes of these latter days.

The time is great; we want no weaklings now
To lead us on to life's great victory;
But men both strong and stern, who know no fear,
Save fear to do a wrong, who learned to face
Unflinching long ago what's worse than death—
A life which is the death of mind and soul.
To face unflinching and to conquer it,
And cry to millions in despair "Take heart!
We've found the way to help, and hope, and life,
To feed our starving babes, to lift our wives
From the foul air of filthy tenements
To the pure atmosphere of joy and love.
There's hope, there's help—in justice is our strength,
And reason is the sword with which she sweeps
To death and to oblivion all her foes."

The time is great! We will not little be,
Unworthy sons of such a mighty age.
We'll fight, we'll die for justice, and we'll win
Freedom for both the tyrant and the slave.

They "Mean Business."

For many years the manufacturers of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy have offered, in good faith, $500 reward for a case of Nasal Catarrh which they cannot cure. The remedy is sold by druggists at only 50 cents. This wonderful remedy has fairly attained a world-wide reputation. If you have dull, heavy headache, obstruction of the nasal passages, discharges falling from the head into the throat, sometimes profuse, watery, and acrid, at others, thick, tenacious, mucous, purulent, bloody and putrid, if the eyes are weak, watery and inflamed; if there is ringing in the ears, deafness, hacking or coughing to clear the throat, expectoration of offensive matter, together with scabs from ulcers, the voice being changed and has a nasal twang; the breath offensive; smell and taste impaired, sensation of dizziness, with mental depression, a hacking cough and general debility, you are suffering from nasal catarrh. The more complicated your disease, the greater the number and diversity of symptoms. Thousands of cases annually, without manifesting half of the above symptoms, result in consumption, and end in the grave. No disease is so common, more deceptive and dangerous, less understood, or more unsuccessfully treated by physicians.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Balsam Valley Items.

From our own Correspondent

We are going to have a new neighbor on the 15th, in the person of James Olcorn, who intends moving on W. Stewart's place, which he has rented. It is Mr. Stewart's intention to move on his other farm after he gets the house fixed. He is at present busy taking out timber for the erection of a frame stabble which he will raise in the spring. Mr. A. McLeod, along with a few of the neighbors is helping him to take it out.

Mr. J. T. Wilson is going to put a barn to his farm next summer. We do not know who has the job but hope he will get it.

Proton Station.

From [illegible]

The snow is just disappearing under the mid-day rays of the bright sun, which is almost as hot as summer, and the merry jingle of sleighbells will soon be a memory.

Mr. P. Ryan, who has been ill for some time, is, we are glad to say, on a fair way to recovery, as is also Richard Hodgson, who has been confined to his bed for a long time. We hope to see both named gentlemen around soon.

A good shoemaker would do a rushing business here as there are lots of people to be booted.

Our general station is coming slow but sure.

Mr. Alfred Ward, of Collingwood, is about to move to Proton Station. Our population is fast increasing. More are welcome. Come to Proton and happy be.

Meaford Road.

From our own correspondent

Mr. Thorpe Wright has been pressing hay in our neighborhood recently.

Vandeleur school was closed a few days last week owing to the absence of the teacher, who was attending the funeral of his sister at a distance.

Our highly respected citizen, Mr. Robt. Buchanan, has been and gone and done it, and now enjoys wedded bliss. A happy little company gathered at the residence of Mrs. Pritchard on Saturday last when the nuptial knot was tied by Rev. J. W. Shilton, of Flesherton. We almost forget to say that Mrs. Pritchard was the other interested party.

Priceville.

From our own Correspondent.

February 1880 passed away with a smile. Some of our weather prophets predict a cold and stormy April.

On Monday a span of spirited colts, which were standing in the street, seemed to get disgusted with a dog fight and started off with the sleigh containing two little arabs who hooked on for a ride. The horses sailed up street towards the Methodist Church and turned at the corner, hotly pursued by two "Flesherton Barber" and two stout ladies in a cutter, drawn by a small pony, but in a minute or two the runaways were nicely captured by a big bank of snow, away up on the west corner, summit of Castle Hill.

Mr. Duncan, late of Crown Hotel, has removed to his suburban residence, a half a mile to the west of the town.

Master Workman Ferguson seems to be well satisfied with the business transacted at the A. O. U. W. convention at Toronto a few days ago.

On Monday the afternoon stage failed to meet the train. Just as Duncan drove rapidly down Mr. Gilchrist's hill to the post office, the relentless iron horse puffed away from the station and was lost to sight among the hills by the lake.

We would rather have had this winter spread over four months than have it boiled down to eight weeks. When a whole week's weather is crowded into one day the general opinion is that it is a little too concentrated. However as our wishes are not consulted in the matter and no blame rests upon us we accept what comes with resignation, but reserve the right to grumble a little about it just as well as any other native of this free soil and glorious climate.—Durham Chronicle.

Eugenia

From an Occasional Correspondent.

We are glad to learn that Mrs. Woodburn has considerably recovered from her late severe attack of heart disease and nervous prostration.

The Methodists are about to put a new organ in the church to be used by both church and Sunday School. The Union Sunday School supplied themselves with one last week and it is already clear of debt which circumstance speaks well for the financial standing of the school. It is to be hoped that the music will be a great impetus to the interest in divine worship and that there may be an infusion of life into the dry bones.

The Rev. Mr. Watson, Baptist minister of Flesherton is to preach in the orange hall next Sabbath and thereafter every alternate Sabbath.

The Rev. Mr. Watts is holding revival services at Kimberley.

I understand that Mr. F. T. Carr has the contract of cutting laths in Mr. Hayard's mill, Proton Station, during the ensuing summer.

A large amount of timber has been hauled through here during the winter and timbermen say there are 10 000 feet to haul yet.

Mr. J. Hoeth has once more returned to this town and settled in stony hollow. It must be hard to tear oneself away from old associations.

Kimberley.

From our own Correspondent.

Business is booming here at present. The church shed timber is almost all on the ground and the people expect to erect it in a few days if the weather is favorable. The shed will be 66 feet long, and one of the pieces secured was 66 feet long. It was cut on the farm of Mr. J. M. Thurston. THURSDAY, MARCH 14 1889.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

The Advance announces with much pleasure that it has secured the services of a talented gentleman who will contribute articles of much interest from the far away lumber shanties of Algoma. This gentleman's facile pen has charmed readers of the Canadian press for many years. In the February number of "Current Literature" appears quite a lengthy article by the writer referred to. The first of the series appears this week. It must not, however, be taken as a standard, as it was written in much haste and is necessarily short. We bespeak for our readers something of a treat in the near future.

VITAL STATISTICS.

From the Government report of births, marriages and deaths in Ontario we find the following interesting information concerning the year 1887, being the latest published.

The marriages registered in 1887 numbered 14,460 or 6.8 per 1,000 of the population, an increase of 615 couples married. In the cities 3,147 were registered, 11.1 per 1,000, an increase of 147; and in the towns the marriages were 1,656 or 13.7 per 1,000, an increase of 312 over the number of marriages celebrated in 1886.

The Methodists, as usual, head the list, notwithstanding that there was a small decrease in comparison with 1886, they numbered 10,212 or 35.4 per cent. of all the persons married. The Presbyterians returned 5,810 or 20 per cent.; the Episcopalians 5,052 or 17.5 per cent., and the Roman Catholics 4,160 or 14.4 per cent.

October and December still retain their prestige of being the favorite months for entering the married state. Of the 14,460 marriages, 3,132 or 21.6 per cent. were solemnized in these two months, whereas in May only 875 marriages, or 6.5 per cent., were celebrated. For a number of years previous to 1887, August always returned the lowest number of marriages.

In the County of Grey there were registered 1,446 births, 460 marriages and 632 deaths. There was an increase of 16 births over the previous year, a decrease of 10 marriages, and an increase of 51 deaths.

In the death rate of counties in Ontario per each 1,000 of population, York heads the list with 20½, Carleton next with 17½, while the county of Grey has the pleasure of numbering only 8¼ deaths to each 1,000 of its population, being the healthiest county in Ontario with four exceptions, viz., Huron, Leeds and Grenville, Norfolk, and Simcoe, which are a fraction below, the lowest being Norfolk, having an average of 7½.

Among the cities Ottawa has the [illegible] Toronto follows with 21¼, Kingston 17, Hamilton 16½, [illegible]

The figures are exceedingly interesting, and we would like to give more if space would permit. From what have been given Advance readers will see [illegible] compares favorably with the great majority of her sister counties.

M. Richardson & Co., have made large purchases of dry goods from the assignees of the bankrupt stock of the wholesale dry goods firm of J. W. Gale & Co., to arrive this week.

Over in Priceville.

We paid Priceville a visit on Saturday last. There is nothing startling about this information as we have done the same thing before. However, as we are very quiet ourselves and our advent into that town was unaccompanied with noise or commotion of any kind, the assertion is made, for the benefit of those who did not know the fact, that we visited Priceville on Saturday.

The first genial countenance which we met was that of our intelligent councillor, Mr. John McArthur. It was a stormy day - too stormy for ordinary work - and he was engaged in harnessing a pair of well-bred dogs to a handsleigh. Although the occupation was not exactly in keeping with dignity yet a man can place dignity into any occupation and get lots of fun out of it too. In this case it was all done in a dignified manner all excepting the way in which the dogs refused to go. They "fit." We left Mr. McArthur deeply engrossed in a game of checkers at Mr. Conkey's boot and shoe store. Alf Watson acted as referee.

Dr. Hutton was just driving away as we neared his office. By the way, people say he is acquiring a first class practice and winning the confidence of his patrons. Glad to hear it because he is deserving.

J. Brown, Esq., merchant, will rebuild his sawmill, which was burned last summer. A portion of the material is on the ground and operations will commence as soon as weather will permit.

In Mr. McGowan's saw mill 300,000 feet of lumber have been manufactured this winter.

The Crown hotel has lately changed hands, Mr. Wm. Burt, lately of Holstein, being the new incumbent.

McKinnon & Co. were doing a rushing business.

Mr. McCabe gives in this issue his spring announcement, which speaks for itself. Mr. McCabe is a sterling business man, and is doing well. Get your spring goods from him.

Priceville rink is not well patronized. So says the proprietor, Mr. Frances Watt.

Last, but not least by any means, we would desire to call the attention of our readers to Mr. J. Brown's announcement in our local columns. He has a fine stock and his store is well known throughout the surrounding townships. When in Priceville look in upon him as we did, and you will be welcomed, as we were.

M. Richardson & Co. have just received advices of shipment per Steam Ship "City of Berlin" from Liverpool, England, of a large consignment of spring and summer dress goods, silks, ribbons, gloves, etc., etc. Direct importations.

Our Algoma Letter.

This district of Algoma is coming more into prominence every year. The great pine limits and mineral wealth are coming to be known and appreciated. Men of means with a turn to speculation and enterprise are making this the seat of their operations. I heard an old miner from British Columbia say that Algoma must have any amount of mineral, judging by the aspect of the country and other signs so well known to mineralogists. What few mines have been found, and are now in working shape, are turning out rich in pay dirt. This district, which a few years ago was reckoned as almost useless, is now settling up rapidly. Villages are springing [illegible] Waiting for a week [illegible] Saturday [illegible] Algoma [illegible] Workmen [illegible] only for the vast number of [illegible] Swedes and Finlanders [illegible] These men will work [illegible] wages [illegible] settlers in the Province from the [illegible] the Pacific coast. The [illegible] Central and ignorant in the extreme [illegible] food when in Canada [illegible] only cost them a few cents per day. [illegible] money they make is sent to their own countries. Four or five hundred dollars will make one of them independent when his returns home. In Finland one mark will buy as much as one dollar here. Five [illegible] five hundred dollars will make a great sum. I think Algoma will in course of time take the precedence of older sections. There [illegible] older sections of Ontario is now [illegible] SHANTY BOY.

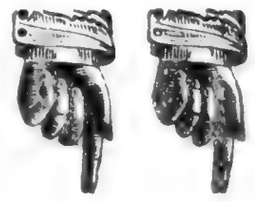
TO THE DEAF. A person cured of Deafness and noises in the head of 23 years' standing by a simple remedy, will send a description FREE to any Person who applies to NICHOLSON, 177 McDonald Street, New York.



The Past.

For six years I have labored to establish a living business on the basis of honorable dealing with all—handling reliable goods at fair prices, and endeavoring to give "value received" every time goods are exchanged for money, note or credit. I have been "thrust into" something of success by the generous support of a large section of "Central Grey" which would not have come it undeserved.

The Present

Being fully established on the above lines, and having a very complete stock in all regular watchers' lines, I shall expect and endeavor to still deserve the confidence and support of all past patrons, and will hope to gain new ones as 1889 rolls along.

The Future.

I trust to be able this year to keep my stock even better assorted for customers to select from. Will continue to buy from A 1 firms at closest possible prices, and offer all buyers reliable watches, etc., at "bed rock" prices. A call solicited. Goods and work warranted.

Love's Tragedy.

Once death drew near with stealthy tread,
And bent him o'er the dreaming head
Of one who lay with fever burned;
But he awoke and from him spurned
The spectral form, and loud he cried,
"Get you away! the world is wide,
And there are those who love not life,
Who sicken 'mid the daily strife
Of pressing years, and sigh and crave
The rest that lies beyond the grave.

"Not so with me, I love the light
That shines o'er youth's fair pathway bright;
Nor shall I thus in life's sweet morn
So swift of life's best gift be shorn.
Around me the green earth is spread—
With summer she will soon be wed—
And through the window, open wide
Afar I see the mountain side,
And down its slope the breezes play,
And all things smile, for it is May.
Come if you will when skies are drear,
But go you now and leave me here."

His mother stood with bated breath,
Nor dreamed that he could conquer death;
But death passed on and left him free:
But scarce the haunting fear would flee
Her timid heart, who felt she heard
His step if but the light wind stirred,
And ever bent a listening ear,
So keen and watchful is love's fear.
But days passed on and he was spared,
And for a year her life he shared
In health and happy diligence,
Then fell the thunderbolt! From whence?
Poor mother! to thine anguished eyes
It seemed to fall from the clear skies—
So swift, so sudden was the blow—
No heavier grief do mortals know.
And in that hour a sweet joy was slain,
And never will revive again
Without a word she let him go,
But changed was everything below.
The summer skies e'en seemed to steep
The same green earth in blackness deep.
Death ever owns this awful power,
Nor is there balm for such an hour.
And now dull sorrow sets her seal—
That scarce slow time may hope to heal—
Of longing for these clasping hands
Death tears away to other lands
More fair than this, nor leaves a sign
That we the gateway may divine.
O Thou who art the hidden source
Of love and sorrow and the force
That brought these currents into play,
And let within the soul a ray
Of hope and trust to shine beyond
The dark cold grave, hast Thou no wand
Whose sure kind touch will healing bring
Swifter than time's slow moving wing?
If Thou wouldst let us mortals glide
Into the valley of death beside
The speeding phantom of the soul
Till it would reach the distant goal,
We would come back to earth and ply
Our daily tasks without a sigh,
Content to know that over there
This life continued still more fair.
It may not be! That far off shore
Is hidden from mortals evermore;
Our earthly eyes will never see
The glories of eternity

Hamilton, February 24th. KATIE W.

ESTELLE'S INFATUATION:

A NOVEL.

Charlie's handsome face flushed; his small, cleanly moulded head and finely cut features wore the air and look of royal disdain. The money was a temptation, as he had admitted, but gained at such a price—by association with such dreadful creatures—by work on such a really "awful" house—it would be too dearly bought. He was not of the kind to see the fun of the position, nor to make capital out of its humor. He was only disgusted with its commonness and vulgarity; and he scarcely cared to conceal what he felt.

"I fear that to begin at all in the room will entail too many alterations," he said coldly. "These curtains must be changed. This blue will not suit my scheme of color, and this yellow border is inadmissible, even as things are."

"Lo ye now!" said Miles, all in amaze. "And I, who thought these curtains tiptoppers! They cost a power of money, so they should be something good. And th' stuff in them is of the best, that I know."

"The material is handsome, but the color is bad," said Charlie, with a shudder.

"Lo ye now!" said Miles again, screwing up his eyes a little ominously, and making a deprecatory kind of click with his tongue. "And the carpet will not do," continued Charlie. "This fiery red will kill everything; and the chairs and sofas are not right; the shapes and coverings are both wrong"

"Ay! them's all wrong, too?" said Miles, with unwonted quietness.

"Quite wrong," said Charlie, deceived by appearances, and giving the reins to his hobby horse. "The ottomans, too, are just impossible; and that modern china is too dreadful. And you cannot have those heavy cut-glass chandeliers. You cannot have gas in the room at all."

He grew warmer as he went on—his artistic taste was so thoroughly outraged.

"Oh, Miles, man alive, it's just a wicked waste of money!" cried Nancy, unable to contain herself longer. "All this here, that's as good as new, as a body might say, and as fine as five-pence, to be carted off for a whim that's to do no good to any one. It's just shameful, and I'll say it were it ever so. It'll not bring a blessing on thee, Miles, to scatter thy brass in this wild gait, and so I tell thee."

"Nay, what I think, the wife is about right," said Miles, speaking very slowly, for he was truly aghast at the wholesale condemnation of his grand room. He and the local upholsterer had furnished it between them; for he had loyally done his best to give all of his own a lift, and neither cost nor material had been spared. And now to have it touched with this cruel spear that blackened and blighted wherever it struck. It was more than he could stand; and Nancy, woman, was about right. The paper he would not stand out for, nor, for the matter of that, would she. She had never liked that mauve fleshed young woman with nothing on but a scarf in a bow above her head and a line down her shoulders; and that lumpy Cupid, made of apples strung together, and as naked as when he was born, had always shocked her sense of what a well-conditioned bairn should be. But when it came to the curtains and the carpets, the sofas and the chairs, that huge cut-glass chandelier with its drops like diamonds, the tables and ornaments—in fact, to every individual thing in the big room—then Miles himself paused and faltered before he took the leap. He did not care about the money the change would cost. Quite the contrary. What he did care for was the slap in his face on the matter of taste, and the condemnation of things he had learned not only to connect with his prosperity, but to regard as the dumb witness of his own merit.

"It's a clean sweep' anyhow," he went on to say, his color rising as he spoke. "We have been content and pretty proud, Nancy and me and the lad, with what we have had; and I don't like the looks of turning one's back on all at once of one's own for the word of a stranger who doesn't feel with us—and maybe has other thoughts," he added, darkly. "So I think, Mr. Osborne, sir, we'll sleep on this matter before we make a serious calculation."

"Of course, that is just as you wish," said Charlie, coldly.

"Well, you see, I'm a little out of breath and flabbergasted; and I'm not so sure as I'd like all these changes when made, and I'd like to see a proof before I paid," said Miles. "One doesn't do so well to give one's self up too soon into the hands of a stranger as has other thoughts," he repeated.

"Oh!" said Charlie, with all a gentleman's pride and artist's disdain in his voice and manner; "if you do not think I understand my own business, we had better not think any more about it. In such a thing as this I must have carte blanche or none at all."

"I don't know what you mean about carts nor barrows neither," shouted Miles, thoroughly nettled; "but if you think you are a-going to ride rough-shod over me, young man, you are mistaken, Mr. Osborne, and so I tell you. It is me as pays, and me has to be agreeable to this, that, and t'other—not for a stranger to come in and order shifts and gangs and sets the seams as he has a mind, and never a body to say him nay. Not if I know it—and now you know."

"Whisht, Miles—whisht, honey!" said Nancy, in a terrified voice.

"Hold hard, father," said Caleb, with unwonted decision,

"Nay, but I'll have my say if I die for it!" said Miles, his voice raised to its angry bellow.

"You have said enough," said Charlie. "Nothing you could offer me would induce me to accept this work, and I wish you good-day."

"And good-day to you, sir, for a jackadandy, if ever there was one!" shouted Miles; while Nancy besought the young gentleman to take a snack, and Caleb went with him to the door saying he must not mind what father had said—father's bark was worse than his bite, and Mr. Osborne was not to feel offended—he knew so much better than father, he could afford to let him rave.

CHAPTER XVI.

HOW IT CAME ABOUT.

Still boiling with indignation—in a bluff and a fume all through—Charlie Osborne walked on to the Dower House, where he hoped to see Lady Elizabeth and Estelle. Since the collapse of her notable scheme for her daughter's endowment with unhappiness and wealth, Mrs. Clanricarde had in a manner let go the reins, laid down the whip, and given the girl her head. Meanwhile Estelle, being but a maid of mortal mould, made good use of her increased liberty; and Charlie Osborne profited.

It had been already arranged between the young lovers that they were to meet at the Dower House to-day by that lucky chance which is part of the craft and diplomacy of love. So that Charlie felt sure of falling in with Estelle somewhere about the place, should Lady Elizabeth be out—which was not likely, as he knew she would be anxious to hear the result of her recommendation.

So it all proved. Lady Elizabeth was at home in her own private "work-room," and Estelle Clanricarde was with her sitting as her model for the head of Ruth gleaning in the fields of Boaz, at which she was working with as much zeal as if painting was her profession and an order her ambition.

"Well!" said Lady Elizabeth, after the first greetings were over; "and what about the commission?"

"Oh!" said Charlie, tossing up his handsome head; "it has come to nothing, of course!"

"Why of course!" and "Oh, Charlie!" said the two girls in a breath

"Because I am a gentleman, Lady Elizabeth," said Charlie, with infinite disdain; "and I could not consent to work for such scoundrels if I had not a penny-piece in the world! I would rather buy a broom and sweep a crossing!"

"Caleb Stagg is not a scoundrel," said Lady Elizabeth, gently.

"His father is, if he is not," broke in Charlie, with more heat than courtesy.

"Rude, perhaps, and boorish, but I should scarcely call him a scoundrel," the lady again insisted, as gently as before, but also as firmly.

"In any case, how could I work for a wretch who has not the smallest rudiment of taste—who puts together the vilest and most immoral colors—prefers hideous forms to righteous—and knows no more of value than what is so much money worth! Lady Elizabeth, it is impossible!"

"But you might be a missionary, and teach the heathen," continued the lady.

"Can you teach pigs?" retorted Charlie, scornfully. "Besides, that old scoundrel insulted me. How could I accept a commission from a man who not only does not know one thing from another, but who does not know how to behave with common decency? How could he?—a mere brute like that—a miner yesterday and nothing but a miner to-day with a pot of money he would be far better without. Such a trio as they are! I declare they made me ashamed of my own species."

"We cannot help their wealth," said Lady Elizabeth. "They have the money, you see, and it was honestly earned, so they must keep it. But if we could make him distribute it wisely, that would be a gain to every one alike. That was what I thought of when I proposed this room to them and to you. I thought that it would be both a noble piece of work for the future occupier of Redhill, if the present would scarcely appreciate it at its full value—and that you would be the gainer by so much, and"—looking at Estelle—"would be so much nearer your happiness."

"I know all that, dear Lady Elizabeth," said Charlie, feeling more contrite than he cared to express, but resolved to fight it out on his chosen lines of dignity and gentlehood; "and you may be sure it cost me something to turn my back on what would have been a splendid bit of work all through. But, believe me, I could not! It would have been impossible! and neither you nor Estelle would have wished it had you realized all the conditions"

"I am sure you did right, Charlie," put in Estelle, hastily. Not for worlds would she let him see that she was disappointed, or in any way doubted the absolute wisdom of his action "As Charlie says, it would have been impossible," she added.

A tender smile, a little tinged with sadness, crossed Lady Elizabeth's face. The three years that lay between her and Estelle, as well as the difference in their characters, gave her the air and sentiment of far more experience than perhaps the reality warranted.

"Well, we must think of something else, as this has failed," said the lady, after a pause. "I must try and get you a commission," to Charlie, with one of her charming, generous smiles, meaning to say that she was in no wise offended by this rejection of her first efforts. "I am determined you shall succeed," she went on to say, playfully; "and I feel strong enough to conquer fortune for you. We will introduce you to Mr. Smythe Smith. He is coming down to stay with us for a few days; and perhaps that will be a better thing for you in the end than this would have been. But this would have kept you here—which was a consideration;" looking at Estelle as girls do when they are sympathetic with a love affair.

"It cannot be helped," said Charlie, mounted on his very highest horse. "Essential as money is to me, I cannot barter for it my self-respect; and to have worked for this old ruffian, and for such a house of horrors, would have been to practically sell myself. Art, to be worthy of its high mission, ought to be worthily represented," he added loftily. "In this deplorable age of ours the artist is the only true priest, and he must be equal to his office."

"Yes," said Estelle, her soft eyes full to overflowing with that kind of love which stirs a man's inmost soul—the love that unites intellectual influence with spiritual adoration and personal fondness—the love that makes of the lover a hero and a demi-god to himself—the love on which artists and poets live as the enchantress Maimouna lived on the breath of flowers, as birds of paradise are intoxicated with the dews of heaven—that love of the most dangerous both to her who gives and to him who receives. The one it robs of self-respect and a higher standard; the other it robs of a god greater than himself—of a law purer than his own will.

"Yes," too, said Lady Elizabeth. "But there is also something grand in being nobler than one's own pride," she added. "Self-forgetfulness has its own splendor, has it not? And I always think that line of George Herbert's 'Who sweeps a room as for Thy laws,' might from my standpoint," was her reply. "I would never wish any one to do what seemed to him mean or degrading."

"You would only wish me to do what was mean and degrading from another platform—blinded by another set of motives?" said Charlie.

"Of course it all depends on the way in which we look at things," she said quietly; and Charlie, rather ashamed of himself, but too proud to confess, said "Yes" just as quietly. Which ended the conversation, and decomposed all the thoughts that had created it.

"But," as Charlie said to Estelle afterward—"but that I really love Lady Elizabeth like my sister, I should get provoked at her ultra ideas. I am, I hope, as high-minded as any man, and would scorn to do a mean or pitiful action as much as any one, but really I cannot follow her—and no one could. It is just Utopia that she imagines. It would be the millennium if it were all true, and that is ridiculous."

"Yes," said Estelle; "and yet"—loyalty to her friend coloring even her submission to her lover—"she is so good! She is an angel!"

"That's just it," said Charlie; "she is more of an angel than a woman; and I confess I like woman better than angels! I know one, however, who is both!" he added, fondly.

Whereon they started off into the mellifluous babble of love, and forgot all in the delight of the moment and the joy of the hour.

A few days after this Mr. and Mrs. Smythe Smith, the new millionaires, came down to visit Lord Kingshouse; and Lady Elizabeth, this transparent and angelic creature, laid her kindly traps and baited them as deftly as Mrs Clanricarde herself could have done. She spoke to Mrs. Smythe Smith of their clever and delightful young artist, of his beautiful ideas, his delicate fancies, his original genius, his certainty of future fame. He was at the right moment for plucking a far-seeing and intelligent patron. Mr. Smythe Smith said he would rather prefer a man of known repute, a man whose name alone would add lustre to his worth, and cause the envious world to admire without cavil. Mrs. Smythe Smith, on the other hand, inclined to the undiscovered genius, whom also she thought she could a little deflect, if not bully, and make subservient to her wishes. It would then be "we." "Mr. Osborne and I planned this room—made out this decoration—arranged these details, I proposed this color; I worked up that subject; and I found Mr. Osborne most civil and obliging most ready to adopt my suggestions and carry them out." Yes, she was certainly on the side of the undiscovered genius, and as Mr. Smythe Smith knew that it was good form to give way to a wife before folk, he yielded the point in this instance, and Mrs. Smythe Smith stuck to it. Whence it came to pass that Charlie Osborne and his portfolio were had up to the Dower House, when the designs he had made at Lady Elizabeth's suggestion were looked at, admired, criticised, and pronounced eminently workable and satisfactory.

His manners and appearance both impressed the wealthy parvenu and his wife to a high degree of favor. And before Charlie Osborne well knew where he was, or all that it included, he had agreed to leave Kingshouse and Estelle and go to London with the Smythe Smiths for the art decoration of their magnificent house in Piccadilly. The whole future of the drama hung on this one apparently unimportant act. Had he taken the Redhill commission and stayed where he was, the story of his life and Estelle's would have been completely changed.

CHAPTER XVII.

PANEM ET CIRCENSES.

In this queer life of ours, with its intricacies of sacrifice and its interdependence of circumstances, no pleasure comes to one without pain to another. Gethsemane is the mirror of the world and coeval with the ages; and the stream of those who pass through the gates of its mournful garden is as large as life itself.

Now here at Kingshouse, in a small way and with narrow borderings, was enacted the old familiar drama of gain and loss. The "panem et circenses" offered to Charlie meant banyan days in the house of happiness to Estelle; and Love suffered equally with each because Prosperity took up the running one. There was this consolation, however—Charlie's prosperity would be eventually Estelle's happiness; for, of course, she was as fixed in her determination to wait for him, all her life if need be, and never marry another, come what might—as fixed as those stars in the sky, which somehow seemed her sympathizers and confidantes when her mother was acrid and Charlie invisible.

Their parting was in secret, as their meetings had been. When the handsome young detrimental called at Les Saules to salve over old sores and blot out old scores, he saw Mr. and Mrs. Clanricarde only. Estelle was in the wood, and her mother was not too curious as to her daughters whereabouts. She was too grateful to Providence and Mr. Smythe Smith to grudge a few crumbs of content to the poor little dove who was to be the sacrifice. Believing as she did in the transforming power of change and absence, she trusted in these to destroy the love into which the old boy and girl affection had developed. Besides, the chapter of accidents for a beautiful young creature like Estelle has very broad margin and a very long coda. Hence she could afford to be quite human to Charlie Osborne when he came to take his leave of them all; and even condescended to speak of Estelle's absence as something in which he might be supposed to take an interest. It was folly well over, she thought—something like measles or nettle-rash, or haply scarlatina, and she did not foresee "sequelæ."

An Ingenious Device.

The friends of ballot reform in the New York Legislature have met in a very ingenious way the objection to an official marking of the ballots voted at any election. The plan is to print the ballots with a small tag or stub on each, separated from the ballot by a perforated line. When the elector deposits his ballot he folds it so as to leave only the tag exposed. This is torn off by the inspector or clerk and marked with his initials, while the ballot goes into the box without any distinguishing mark by which it can possibly be connected with the elector depositing it. At the same time there is an effectual check upon the use of any but officially printed ballots.—Detroit Free Press.

Didn't Suit.

Mother—"Well, did you get that situation as office boy?"

Little son—"Nope."

"What was the matter?"

"Don't know. The gent is a lawyer, and he asked me if I was a good whistler, and I told him I was the best whistler on our street, and he said I wouldn't do. Guess he must want a regular professional.

POOR GIRL! POOR MAN!

He Rescued Her and Married Her, but She Wouldn't Stay Good.

The Rev. Leander Scott is a tall, clerical-looking man who resides on One Hundred and Fourteenth street, New York. He is a missionary connected with the Fiftieth Street M. E. Church in that city, and takes a great interest in the Florence Night Mission on Bleecker street. This morning he applied to Justice Cullen, of the Supreme Court, for an absolute divorce from his wife, and told a story that has not its parallel outside the realm of fiction. From his testimony it appeared that among the most promising of the unfortunate women who found their way into the Florence Mission was Charlotte Softye, a flaxen-haired, blue-eyed girl, scarcely out of her teens. She seemed to have repented and awakened the sympathy of Rev. Mr. Scott, who is a widower with grown-up children. The missionary, believing her protestations of reform to be sincere, determined to aid her in keeping her good resolutions. He proposed marriage to her, telling her that when once an honest wife she would have no desire to return to her evil ways. Charlotte consented, and on August 17th, 1887, she became Rev. Mrs. Leander Scott. For a week they lived happily and Charlotte gave her husband no cause to regret his remarkable act.

On the evening of August 24th, seven days after the marriage, Mrs. Scott went out shopping. She did not return, although her husband waited up for her all night. The rest of the story is told by Charlotte Ressigue, an assistant at the Florence Night Mission. She said to Justice Cullen:

"On the morning of August 25th, 1887, the Rev. Mr. Scott came to my house before I was out of bed. I dressed hurriedly and went to see what was wanted. He said to me, 'My wife has not been home all night. Please help me to find her.' I then went with him to No. 18 East Third street, New York, where we found her in company with a young man named Dick, whose name, I think, is Richard Benson, as Mrs. Scott afterward called herself Benson. I asked her to return to her husband. She said she would not do so; that she did not care for him, and would live with him no longer. She refused to see her husband, and Mr. Scott and I left the house."

Justice Cullen—Was she unfortunate when the plaintiff married her?

"She was," said Miss Ressigue, "but she had reformed. I tried to reform her after the last occurrence, but she fled from the mission and is now living in a flat."

The papers in the suit were served by the Rev. Mr. Scott's son, who was not present Judge Cullen adjourned the hearing in order to have these present to testify. It is understood that Mr. Scott waited so long before beginning the action because he believed he could reclaim his wife. He seems to have abandoned that idea.—Brooklyn Eagle.

Men and Women.

Sex traits open up a curious study. Men are influenced by opinions of their own and of the other sex. Women are largely indifferent to the views of men and are sensitive to the last degree about their own kind. They are willing men should admire their beauty, and they will marry on occasion; but here the preference to masculine sentiment pretty much ceases. The opinion of a half dozen women on a mooted point weighs more with a woman than the judgment of a whole community of men. Women dress for each other, suit their manners for each other, copy each other, and yet distrust each other, whilst they have confidence in and respect for the very men whose desires and views they substantially ignore. It is a singular phenomenon. It shows how much more fully rounded the mental life of a man is, since he takes in both sexes, whilst woman mainly confines herself to one, viz., her own. A woman has one great advantage in her dealings with a man. She understands a man; but no man ever understood a woman. The knowledge is all on one side. The amusing part of the social relations between the sexes is that men are oblivious of the fact that women are always adroitly playing a part, whilst men, good, stupid souls, are clumsily honest and in earnest. If they were permitted to listen to the comments of the women on them they would be disagreeably enlightened. Man, too, emancipates himself often from slavish deference to the opinion of his own kind, but woman never frees herself from slavery to her own sisterhood. They rule men and make one another everlastingly uncomfortable. It is a comedy of errors.

Andrew Lang on Amelie Rives.

In America you have seen, not long since, the "catching on" of a novel, followed by excursions and alarums, as it were, of a Presidential election. To name the novel, "The Quick or the Dead," is almost superfluous. The hubbub, as usual, has arisen, I understand, upon a "point of order." People have not so much asked, "What are the literary merits and demerits of the work?" as a different question—"Was this a nice book for a young lady to write?" Why, if a young lady had not written it, who on earth would? An old lady? A middle-aged man? An infant in arms? Criticism exists for the improvement of the author and the guidance of the public; but it is not easy to reckon what the trouble about Mrs. Chanler's tale has done for either audience or author. The truth about the novel probably is that, amidst a perfect tempest of deranged epithets and deplorable style, a gleam of real and rare talent may be seen like a star through a witch's storm. —From the March Forum.

Too Much of a Good Thing.

Applicant (with little girl)—Do you take children, madam?

Landlady—Oh, yes, ma'am; we love children; the family on third floor have five, on the second floor there are seven, and we have three of our own. You needn't feel any hesitancy on that score.

Applicant—H'm, yes. I think I will look a little further, madam.—Harper's Bazar.

The farming of the future must be gradually contracted in the number of acres. Less hard work over broad fields and closer attention to special paying crops on the fields that surround the house. More pasture, more stock and plenty of ensilage, this insure the purchase of less commercial fertilizer and the very best results from the contents of the barn-yard.

Such a Fool!

He was always a fool—Tom Lake—and we always were telling him so,
But where was the harm in that? It was just as well he should know,
And he didn't mind it a bit—not he—or but once in a way—
Vex him? I think that he liked it! What else would one think here to-day?

We'd a holiday given last week, and we walked—d'ye see it, the mill
A-twirl like a fly on a pin? But that morning its sails stood still.
Well, just below it, the lane and the railroad meet Some deserve
To be hung for that level crossing, not twenty yards from the curve.

And there, as we came to the place where we saw the smooch metals a shine,
The mill folk's bit of a child that's blind had strayed down on to the line.
And had lost itself, and got frightened—it couldn't have told you why;
It owns little enough to lose, since it's lost both the earth and sky.

But to see it crying there, in the dark, with its curls in the sun,
Made you feel like a sort of fool—only feel, for you'll hear I was none.
It's hardly 3 year old, and it's blind; anyway, no better it knew
Than to stand right between the rails, with the Western Mail just due.

Due? No but thundering round with a whirl and a clank and a screech
Down on her—down on them both—for Tom som how had rushed within reach.
And had tossed the child safe on the bank, and got knocked down dead for his pains.
Killed on the spot, with a fractured skull. Well, well, if he'd had more brains,

He'd maybe have stopped to consider—we did, as you'll please remark—
Before he dashed out of the light, to leave the child here in the dark.
Yet we didn't call him a fool when we picked him up. There's no need
To be telling a lad the truth, when he hasn't the sense to heed.

And I don't think Fool's the word we'll get carved on yon slab of a stone,
Though he was such a fool—oh aye, such a fool as I've seldom known.

TEN YOUNG GIRLS

Meet Instant Death in a Boiler Explosion—The Engineer Also Killed.

A last (Monday) night's Plymouth, Pa., despatch says: A terrible disaster occurred here to day by which ten girls and one man were killed. Back of the Gaylord shaft stood the factory of John Powell, in which were manufactured squibs used by the miners in loosening coal in the mines. The factory employed 134 girls, ranging from 12 to 20 years, and several male workmen. While the majority of the girls were home eating dinner the people were startled by a deafening explosion. They rushed terror stricken to doors and windows and saw clouds of smoke ascending from the factory. Soon a large crowd gathered around it, and women began wringing their hands and men turned away when the charred body of a young girl was seen in one of the rooms, and the fact became known that at least twenty persons were in the building at the time of the explosion, eating their lunch. The scene was fraught with terror, as the girls, some bleeding, others gasping for fresh air, rushed to the windows and screamed frantically for help. A dozen miners from the adjoining colliery arrived and rushed toward the building, but as soon as they stepped near the door another terrific explosion took place, and the entire building collapsed, burying in the ruins those who had stood crying for assistance. The brave men, when the smoke and flying debris had settled, rushed among the ruins, and one by one the bodies were found and taken out charred beyond recognition, bleeding and mangled. As mothers recognized some familiar token or piece of dress by which they could tell their loved ones, the scene was heartrending. The bodies as fast as taken out were removed to an undertaker's. Their features were so badly mutilated that they were scarcely recognizable.

The killed so far as known are: Kate Jones, aged 18; Maggie Lynch, 21, Hettie Jones, 16; Gladdis Reese, 15; Mary Wallers, 17; Maggie Richards, 17; Mary A. Lake, 17; Ruth Powell, 19; Esther Powell, 22; Jessie Connell, 16; George S. Reese, engineer, 40. John Powell, the proprietor, was badly injured. Business here is at a standstill and the community is plunged in gloom. Several kegs of powder caused the explosion, but how they were exploded is a mystery.

JACK THE RIPPER.

Horrible Mutilation and Murder of a Squaw in Calgary.

A last (Friday) night's Winnipeg despatch says: "Jack the Ripper" has appeared at Calgary, N.W.T. Late last night the body of a squaw was found horribly mutilated in a room over the Turf Club saloon. The abdomen had been cut open and the body otherwise shockingly slashed. Wm. Fisk, a notorious character, has been arrested on suspicion. The accused murderer, Wm. Fisk, came to Calgary in 1882. It appears that Fisk brought the murdered squaw to a room over the Turf Club hotel. She was found later covered with blood and in the last throes of death. Fisk has been gambling a great deal of late and drinking heavily. He gave himself up. He is a nephew of Rev. T. G. Williams, President of the Montreal Methodist Conference. The deceased squaw was called Rosalie and was a tough character. The room was bespattered with blood, and an examination of the body went to show that the wound was entirely made by fingers, and a couple of pieces of flesh torn from the body were found by the Chief of Police under the bed. Dr. Lafferty says that the post-mortem reveals the fact that it is a regular "Jack the Ripper" case. The coroner's jury to-night brought in a verdict of wilful murder against Fisk, and he will be sent up for trial.

From Jest to Earnest.

The little boy had come in with his clothes torn, his hair full of dust and his face bearing unmistakable marks of a severe conflict.

"Oh, Willie! Willie!" exclaimed his mother, deeply shocked and grieved, "you have disobeyed me again. How often have I told you not to play with that wicked Stapleford boy?"

"Mamma," said Willie, washing the blood from his nose, "do I look as if I had been playing with anybody?"

Miseries of Trade.

Druggist (awakened at 2 a. m.)—"What do you wish?"

Voice (at the door)—"If you'll let me look in your directory to see how to address this letter, I'll buy the postage stamp of you."

THE GREAT CONSPIRACY.

Full Text of the Famous Forged Letters.

HOW PIGOTT WORTE THEM.

Rascally Propositions Spurned by Home Rule Leaders.

Patrick Egan, who is now a resident of Lincoln, Nebraska, has made public a number of the letters on which Richard Pigott founded the clever forgeries which he sold to the London Times, and which formed the basis of the "Parnellism and Crime" articles in that paper, leading up to the Parnell-Times Commission and the exposure of the forger, as given in our cablegrams from London. One of the principal forgeries, purporting to have been written to Mr. P. J. Sheridan, was based by Pigott upon this letter, presumably written to Pigott:

11th March, 1882.

DEAR SIR,—As I understand your letter, which reached me to-day, you cannot act as directed unless I forward you money by Monday next. Well, here is £50—more if required. Under existing circumstances what you suggest would not be entertained. I remain, dear sir, yours truly, PATRICK EGAN.

In June, 1881, Pigott offered to sell out his two papers to Mr. Egan and Mr. Parnell, and in the course of the negotiation for the purchase Mr. Egan wrote Pigott as follows:

PARIS, June 18th, 1881.

DEAR SIR,—Your two letters of 13th and 15th inst. are duly at hand, and I am also in receipt of a communication from Mr. Parnell informing me that he has acted upon my suggestion and accepted the offer contained in your first letter. In fact, I have before me copies of his two letters to you, and I am in a position to say that any request to increase the amount named would not be entertained, and that any hesitation or delay in carrying out the transfer would lead to the breaking off of the purchase altogether. I remain, dear sir, yours truly, PATRICK EGAN.

Richard Pigott, Esq.

HOW THE FORGERY READ.

The forger twists this letter into the following shape:

18th June, 1881.

DEAR SIR,—Your two letters of 12th and 15th inst. are duly to hand and I am also in receipt of communications from Mr Parnell informing me that he has acted upon my suggestion and accepted the offer made by S. You had better at once proceed to Dundalk, so that there may be no time lost.—Yours very faithfully, P. EGAN.

Mr. Parnell wrote Pigott in connection with this same matter of the purchase of the papers:

HOUSE OF COMMONS, June 16th, 1881.

R. PIGOTT, Esq., Dublin.

DEAR SIR,—In reply to yours of this date I am sure you will feel that I shall always be anxious to do what I can for you, but I could not consent to one of the conditions of the purchase being your constant employment on the paper. That is a matter which would have to be subject to after arrangement.—Yours very truly,

CHARLES S. PARNELL.

THIS WAS THE WORST OF ALL.

And out of this letter Pigott manufactured two letters purporting to be addressed to Mr. Egan, using the same date, with the exception of the last figure in the year, transposing the language and filling out with words traced from other letters, as follows:

JUNE 16th, 1882.

DEAR SIR, I am sure you will feel that I could not appear in Parliament in the face of this thing unless I condemned it. Our position there is always difficult to maintain; it would be untenable but for the course we took. That is the truth. I can say no more.—Yours very truly,

CHARLES S. PARNELL.

The second forged letter reads as follows

DEAR SIR,—I shall always be anxious to have the good will of your friends, but why do they impugn my motives. I could not consent to the conditions they would impose, but I accept the entire responsibility for what we have done.—Yours very truly, CHARLES S. PARNELL.

AN OPEN ATTEMPT AT BLACKMAIL.

In February, 1881, Pigott wrote a letter to Mr. Egan intimating that an attempt had been made by two agents of Dublin Castle to get him to publish in his papers—the Irishman and Flag of Ireland—a plausible and utterly fictitious set of Land League accounts for the purpose of damaging the League and its officers. Mr. Egan replied, pointing out that it was his (Pigott's) duty to make public the fact that such an offer had been made. Pigott then wrote the following letter:

Irishman, Flag of Ireland and Shamrock—Dublin, March 9, 1881—Office No. 33 Lower Abbey street.

MY DEAR MR. EGAN I was glad to get your note of the 8 h inst., as I thought you had decided to not take any notice of my letter, and I was about to take a step which I could not recall It is well that you should understand the nature of the document I am asked to pub lish. It would be, I think, very damaging to the League, even though it may be proved to be mainly built up of fabrication. It proceeds in this way: It gives the amounts received for the League and acknowledged from week to week, and also the sums stated to have been disbursed. The total amount (as near as I can recollect) said to have been received per the League up to the — of February is £40,000 (in round numbers); taken from the relief fund, £10,000, and surplus of defence fund estimated at £16,000—in all not far short of £70,000. Then the payments for which the League takes credit in its weekly reports is put down at £1,0 0. Then it is asked what has become of the large balance, and goes on to say that so much was paid to one member of Parliament, so much to another, so much for this, that and the other election expenses, and so on, while, it is asserted, shoals of letters from evicted tenants for assistance were being received and disregarded at the League office.

ANOTHER LYING INTIMATION.

Then It is asked why the remaining funds were taken to France and the answer is given, "in order that they might be out of the way not of the Government, who dare not lay a finger on them, but of the people, to assist whom it was subscribed." It is to be kept to sustain Parliamentary agitation and support members of Parliament. Then there is something about a change of treasurers in America, made at your suggestion, in order that the money might reach your hands direct and no one else. This is but the baldest outline of the thing, which in my opinion is very damaging. My reason for thinking that the Castle people are the prime movers is that articles have appeared in the Express written much in the same tendency, but infinitely more guarded and cautious. I enclose one that appeared yesterday. Now, you will see from the enclosed note that if I publish this document I will get £500 and will not be required to vouch for the correctness of any of the statements it contains.

HE DEMANDED MONEY AT ANY COST.

I come to the point, therefore. I am in desperate straits. I must have money somehow or throw up the sponge at once. I cannot afford to let so lucky a chance pass of saving myself literally from ruin. No matter what the consequences are I must and will take this offer, unless you come to my assistance. I will close with these people, send you the full amount I owe you, print the thing and await events, unless you will stand by me. All I want from you is a temporary loan of £500. Surely you can manage that. It may be difficult, but it is to be done I know perfectly well. This will leave me in perfectly smooth water, and I will take no further notice of the other fellows. The money will be sure to be repaid, and prove to be the best laid out money the League has ever expended. Be good enough to give this matter your earliest and most favorable attention. If I do not hear from you by Monday morning I shall be reluctantly compelled to close with these people, because my affairs are now arrived at such a crisis that delay will be fatal.—Faithfully yours, RICHARD PIGOTT.

P. Egan, Esq.

EGAN REFUSES TO BE BLED.

To this Mr. Egan replied as follows:

HOTEL BRIGHTON, No. 218 RUE DE RIVOLI, PARIS, March 11th, 1881.

SIR,—As I understand your letter, which reached me to-day, it is a threat that unless I forward you money by Monday next you will close with the Government and for the consideration of a sum of £500 publish for them certain documents, which you believe to be false, against the Land League. Under any circumstances I have no power to so apply any of the funds of the League. But even if I had the power I would not under any circumstances act upon it. Whenever any such accusations are made we will know how to defend ourselves.—Yours truly, PATRICK EGAN.

Richard Pigott, Esq., Irishman.

Marriage Under Protest.

The Supreme Court of Michigan has been called upon to say whether a ceremony performed under these circumstances constituted a valid marriage: The girl charged her parents with forcing her into marriage with a man she did not want to wed. During the ceremony she told the Justice "if he tied the knot forty times it would not stay tied;" that she "did not like the man" and would not live with him. "They made me stand up," she continued, "and when I was asked whether I would take him to be my husband I said, 'No, I won't,' and on every question asked me that I ought to have said 'yes' I said 'no' plain, and the next day I ran away." In spite of this very unusual conduct the Justice calmly proceeded to pronounce the pair man and wife, with the customary congratulation, and the ceremony was held legal by the Circuit Court. The Supreme Court, however, says "a concurring consent by two minds at the same instant" is essential to a legal marriage, and that the ceremony in this case was not valid because the girl did not consent to it.

The Origin of "My Uncle."

The term uncles, as applied to a pawnbroker's shop, is said to be a pun on the Latin word uncus, a hook. Pawnbrokers employed a hook to lift articles pawned before spouts were adopted. "Gone to the uncus," therefore, is exactly tantamount to the more modern phrase "up the spout." In French the concierge of a prison is called uncle because the prisoners are "kept there in pawn" by government. In the seventeenth century a usurer was called "my uncle" in the Walloon provinces because of his near connection with spendthrifts, called in Latin nepotes, nephews. —Notes and Queries.

THE "PRINCE OF MASHERS."

A Bold Burglar with a Wife in Every City Visited by Him.

HE MARRIES AND THEN DISAPPEARS.

A wife in nearly every city in the country is the record of George McDaniels, the celebrated burglar, who was arrested in this city last week. McDaniels is one of the most desperate criminals in the country, and he is to be returned to Georgia next week to finish out his fifteen-year sentence for a robbery in Savannah.

While his successes at robbery place him in the front rank of professional thievery, his equally romantic exploits in the field of love make a remarkable chronicle. When McDaniels was arrested in this city in 1885 for burglary, a pretty girl who resided near Bridgeton, N.J., and who claimed to be his wife, enlisted the sympathies of many by her devotion to the handsome burglar. His two years' confinement in the Eastern penitentiary evidently extinguished his passion for this faithful girl, and immediately upon his release McDaniels repaired to Florida, where he captivated a 16-year-old Southern beauty of wealth and position. The girl was fascinated by his appearance and refined manners. After a short courtship they were married. The honeymoon was celebrated by McDaniels' arrest for a robbery. He was acquitted, owing to lack of evidence. This was his last matrimonial exploit, and the beginning of a career of crime that resulted in his capture and fifteen years' sentence. He shortly deserted his youthful bride—she procuring a divorce and went to Savannah.

SHE THANKED HER STARS.

A few days after his arrival the town was startled by the news of a jewellery robbery—one of the leading stores had been broken into and a large amount of valuable stock taken. Overconfidence was the cause of McDaniels' arrest. Heedless of the close watch kept on him by the authorities, he packed his plunder in a big box, walked leisurely into the express office, directed the box to himself at New York, and a moment after was under arrest. The proof of his guilt was overwhelming, and he was shortly afterward sentenced. After his sentence the authorities began to discover what a prince of robbers and heartbreakers their capture was. The investigation was prompted by a letter from the girl wife, who suspected her mistake and thanked her lucky stars for securing a divorce. They found that his launch upon the matrimonial sea was made shortly after doing a big job in Chicago, where he made love to a young lady of good looks and family. Victim No. 2 was a popular miss of Fremont, O. He varied the monotony of love-making in Fremont by a big robbery.

HIS POWER OVER WOMEN.

But McDaniels proved the completeness of his power over women when he made love to a beautiful young Ohio girl who had lived near Cincinnati. The authorities tracked five robberies to his account while he was stopping in this town, and he escaped to New York before they could catch him. The plunder was found in the young lady's house, and the police arrested her. Rather than betray her lover she submitted to imprisonment, but was repaid by McDaniels deserting her shortly after. A man in New York, well acquainted with McDaniels, said that he had a wife or sweetheart in every town he ever visited, and that every city complimented by his appearance had to pay dearly for it in the shape of a big robbery.

A GREAT LIST OF CRIMES.

McDaniels is also credited with committing robberies at Reading, Harrisburg, Easton—where three big jobs are charged—Cincinnati, Chicago, Birmingham, Ala.; Louisville, Rochester, Indianapolis and several other towns in Indiana, St. Paul, Boston and Altoona. Several post-office robberies in Illinois are supposed to be the work of this remarkable burglar. The above cities are also the scenes of his triumphs in affairs of the heart. After his escape from the mines last June McDaniels visited a near-by town and secured a fine outfit. He worked his way north to fashionable Saratoga. The detectives say that there is no more dangerous criminal in the country than he.

A DEATH BATTLE EXPECTED.

When he starts for Georgia on Tuesday morning next he will be closely guarded by Detectives Tate and Johnson, of Easton. Any relaxation of watchfulness on their part will probably cost them their lives, as McDaniels has declared that he will not return to the mines alive, if he can prevent it, and vows his intention to escape at any cost. The detectives say that they have not the slightest doubt but that he will kill them if an opportunity shall offer. McDaniels' own threats warrant the assertion. For himself he says: "Hell couldn't have more terrors for a man than those mines, and I'd sooner be sentenced to thirty years in a Northern prison than go back." —Philadelphia Record.

A Phenomenon.

McQueen's Lake, near Sydney, C. B., recently had a remarkable sensation. Ice, with which the lake was covered, suddenly cracked like a boiler explosion, and something like a whale rose above the surface, showing between twenty and sixty feet of its body, according to the reports. Then it subsided, but the hole in the ice and the dirt cast about were left to mark its appearance. The same lake was affected in very much the same manner about twenty years ago, when the ice was about six inches thick. A scientist advances the theory of a hot spring or sort of volcano which is affected periodically, and throws mud, etc., from the bottom of the lake.

Who can tell how such a maiden loathes the very sight of herself, or who shall intrude upon her as she weeps bitter tears over her uncomely appearance? Thrice unhappy she, if by the use of cosmetics she shall seek to hide her wretched complexion. But if she will use Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, to regulate the liver and purify the blood of all poisonous humors, she will find that her "flesh shall come again like unto the flesh of a little child." Concert at Priceville.

The Methodists of Priceville held a concert in their church on Monday evening, which was largely attended and proved a very pleasant affair. Rev. Mr. Ottewell occupied the chair. There were speeches, recitations, readings, vocal and instrumental music. There was one recitation by little Miss Martha Brander, entitled "There is a By and By," which was well worthy of special mention. In fact the whole program showed careful and painstaking training. The object of the concert was to assist in paying off a small debt which hangs over the organ. One of the speakers a Mr. McLean was not in accord with the object in view, and did not hesitate to deliver his opinion upon the folly of having organs in churches. Our reporter has forgotten whether or not a vote of thanks was tendered Mr. McLean. The proceeds were $15.60.

Mrs. Shilton.

Mrs. Clara E Shilton, who will sing in the Methodist church on Friday evening, is a lady of rare attainments. She has received a thorough musical training, being a graduate of the Boston Conservatory of Music. At the concert in the Pavilion, Toronto, mentioned in last week's Advance, which was held under the auspices of the Toronto Conservatory of Music, and at which Madame Albani and suite were present, Mrs. Shilton received the greatest honor of the evening. Madame Albani leaned over the gallery, slapping her hands enthusiastically recalling Mrs. Shilton twice. This from the great prima donna, who ranks second to none in the world, proves that we will have with us a star of brilliant magnitude, and one which Flesherton will seldom, if ever, have the opportunity of hearing again. Any person who has the least music in their souls will long regret it if they do not hear this talented lady on Friday evening.

It is Rumored That

The R.T. of T. will place a new organ in their hall very soon.

And that Carey Treadgold, Esq., will receive the order.

Also that Mr. Treadgold has opened a shop in T. Duncan's old stand

That Mr. Damude is doing a rushing trade in stave bolts for which he pays cash. In fact business is "staving" there.

That we will not have any more carnivals this winter.

That another of our young men is going to the Northwest in a week or two, and will take his snowshoes along. He says he Will go.

That we won't allow any more of our handsome young women to leave this town for foreign territory. The exodus must be stopped!

That Mr McGill has a lending library, only accessible to marriageable young ladies. We think, however, that this rumor is incorrect

A Dialogue.

Who is that young man with a moustache going up the street with the papers in his pocket, Pa ?

That is W. J. Bellamy, the Conveyancer, Insurance and Loan Agent, my son.

Where does he live, Pa ?

In Flesherton, above Dr. Christoe's dwelling, my son.

Is he a nice man, Pa ?

Yes my son he is a very nice, courteous man.

How do you know, Pa ?

Well my son I have had him to do a good deal of business for me and have proved him such.

If you were selling your farm, or getting your buildings insured, or wanted to borrow money, to whom would you go to get the business done, Pa ?

To Mr. Bellamy, my son.

Why, Pa ?

Because my son he has had a large experience in the business, and I should feel sure that it would be done right.

Where does Bellamy get all the money he lends, Pa ?

From the North of Scotland Mortgage Co., my son.

Where does the North of Scotland live, Pa ?

Do not ask me so many questions my son You will drive me crazy.

How long does it take to learn to be a conveyancer, Pa ?

About one month, my son.

But to be a good conveyancer, Pa?

Well my son, in order to know where to get cheap money, to do insurance properly, or to draw deeds, mortgages, leases, wills, &c., correctly, a man should be in the business from five to twenty years.

How long has Mr. Bellamy been in that line, Pa ?

About ten years, my son.

Have you any money, Pa ?

Not now my son, but I am going to borrow some through Mr. Bellamy. What do you want it for ?

I want to buy a North of Scotland, a Waterloo, or a Lancashire, or some of those companies from Mr. Bellamy. How much would they be, Pa ?

Do not ask me any more questions, my child.

Are you soon going home, Pa ?

Just as soon as I leave my application for a loan and insurance with Bellamy, my son.

ONTARIO LEGISLATURE.

The following Bills were read a first time:

To amend the Act respecting the devolution of estates.—Mr Freeman.

To amend the Act for the protection of game and fur-bearing animals.—Mr. Morgan.

The Bill to amend the Ontario Factories Act, in charge of Mr. Fraser, was read a third time without comment.

The House went into committee, advanced a number of Bills a stage and rose again.

Mr. Morgan moved for a return showing the names of the municipalities which have passed by-laws under the authority of the Ontario Shops Regulation Act, distinguishing between cases where such by-laws were passed in pursuance of petitions therefor, and the cases where by-laws were passed without petitions in favor thereof; and showing also which of the by-laws have since been repealed.

Mr. Morgan spoke briefly to his motion, explaining that it was intended to derive information. He hinted, however, that the majority of shopkeepers seemed to regard it as an unwarranted interference with their liberties

Hon. Mr. Fraser consented to the return, but suggested that a few lines should be added to it, requiring additional information concerning the by-laws repealed. He took exception to Mr. Morgan's view that shopkeepers regarded the Bill as an interference with their liberties. His conviction was that the majority of shopkeepers favored the Bill. It was natural, however, that Mr. Morgan, who had originally opposed the measure, should insist upon retaining his original views.

The motion passed as amended.

Mr. Harcourt moved for an address for a copy of the argument before the Privy Council as to the boundaries of this Province; the case submitted to the Privy Council by each of the parties to the reference; the order of Her Majesty in Council thereon, and also a copy of the like documents on the recent appeal to the Privy Council respecting the ownership of the lands in the formerly disputed territory. The motion was carried without comment.

Mr. McKay moved the second reading of his Bill to amend the Act respecting the study of anatomy. He complained that the medical schools of Ontario are at a disadvantage, in this particular, compared with other medical schools, and that too many difficulties are put in the way of bodies being secured for the prosecution of the study. The Bill proposed to remove some of those difficulties, the principal one being that which enables persons not in any way connected with a person deceased, and whose body in ordinary cases would go to medical institutions, to step in and deprive the institution of such body. There were persons, actuated from false motives of humanity, who made a regular practice of doing this, and defeated the ends of the Act.

The Attorney-General admitted the importance of there being ample facility allowed in the study of anatomy, but did not want the law to be too harsh. He suggested that it be referred to a special committee.

A special committee, consisting largely of doctors, was thereupon appointed, and the Bill being read a second time was referred to it.

Mr. Waters moved the second reading of his Bill to amend the Municipal Act, concerning the jurisdiction of County Councils over roads and bridges. The Bill was well known to the House and is equally well known to the country. It has always been turned over to the Municipal Committee and fully considered by it. Messrs. Rae side, Wood (Hastings) and Meredith raised objections to it. Mr. Meredith suggested that considerable expense had been incurred in different parts of the Province last year in the way of deputations, etc., before the Municipal Committee last year had arrived at its decision, and he thought it hardly fair that they should be subjected to a repetition of these expenses so soon. Hon. Mr. Hardy agreed with Mr. Meredith and pointed out the very full and exhaustive discussion that the Bill had several times received before the Municipal Committee, in view of which he hardly thought it necessary to send it there again this year. The Municipal Committee had a tremendous amount of work before it, so much so that he was doubtful if they could get through their work so early as the Attorney-General had recently predicted. This Bill of itself would add immensely to the work of the committee, and therefore he asked Mr. Waters to withdraw it.

The discussion was continued by Messrs. Willoughby, McLaughlin, Dack, Balfour, Phelps, Wood (Brant), Ferguson and Blyth, the speaking being generally against it.

Mr. Waters then withdrew the Bill.

Mr. Meredith moved the second reading of his Bill to amend the Ontario Insurance Act, as respects contracts of life insurance. The main point of the Bill, and that to which he mainly devoted the arguments he used in introducing it, is that a contract is not to be invalidated by any erroneous statement contained in the application, unless such statement shall be material. These possible errors are to include any error that may be made in respect to the age of the applicant if the same should be made in good faith. At the same time the company is not to suffer from any such errors as the last mentioned, the Bill proposing to give the company leave to deduct an equitable sum from the amount originally recoverable by the contract.

Hon. Mr. Gibson raised no objection to the second reading of the Bill, though he pointed out one or two respects in which it would probably have to be amended when it passed into the hands of the committee. The Bill was then read a second time and sent to the Committee on Law Amendment, in spite of the protest of the Commissioner of Public Works, who insisted that the number of bills unloaded upon that committee would end in the funeral of somebody.

Mr. Meredith moved the second reading of his Bill to amend the revised statute respecting arbitrations and preferences. He pointed out the object of the Bill, which is, in brief, that an award or certificate of parties to an arbitration may be filed in the High Court of Justice, and that the time of moving against it be limited to fourteen days from the filing thereof. The Attorney-General accepted the Bill and it was read a second time.

The second Dog Bill of the day then came on the scene. It was in the hands of Mr. Dryden, and was rather on the opposite tack to that introduced earlier in the day by Mr. French. It proposes mainly to amend the law by increasing the annual tax as follows: $2 for a dog and $4 for a bitch, and for each dog after the first $4, and for each bitch $6. Mr. Dryden did his best to show that dogs generally were a nuisance, and that the money spent on them was wasted and that a good deal of foolish sentiment was thrown away upon them. His only object, he said, in proposing to increase the tax was that the number of dogs kept might be diminished He referred to the large number of dogs kept in the State of Ohio, and showed from statistics that during eight years as much as $12,000,000 was expended there in the maintenance of canines, not counting the $1,000,000 damage, or so, that they did during that period. The Bill also proposes to give a man the right to kill a dog "which he finds straying on any farm, unless such dog is securely muzzled or accompanied by and under control of the owner or other person in charge." Mr Dryden showed a marked antipathy to canines throughout and rated them roundly, Mr. French, their friend, looking doggedly on meanwhile. Mr. Dryden so impressed him, however, that he, too, forsook the cause of the oppressed ones, making merely a gentle protest against one or two of its provisions, and the Bill was read a second time and referred to a special committee.

The House then read a second time the Bills of Mr. Craig and Mr. Clarke (Wellington) to amend the Municipal Act, and adjourned at half-past 9 o'clock.

Mr. Fraser's Bill, "the Assessment Amendment Act, 1889," which makes the Assessment Act in line with the Manhood Suffrage Act, was passed through committee of the whole with a few verbal amendments and reported. The Bill requires assessors to return their rolls by the 30th April.

The Bill to amend the Ontario Shops Regulation Act, 1868 (Mr. Fraser), was read the second time, on the understanding that a full discussion might be allowed in committee of the whole.

Mr. Gibson's Bill to amend the Pharmacy Act was read the second time. Its principal clauses provided that the Pharmaceutical Council may have a by-law dividing the Province into thirteen electoral divisions, each to be represented by a member in the council. The thirteen members of the council must be selected from those who are active pharmaceutical chemists in the Province.

Mr. Creighton said the Bill would want watching in Committee of the Whole. The Bill excluded wholesale druggists from seats in the council, a restriction of a very questionable nature.

Mr. Mowat's Bill providing the forms of oaths necessary under the Manhood Suffrage Act was read the second time.

Mr Mowat's Bill regulating certain matters of detail under the Land Titles Act was read the second time.

Mr. Hardy moved the second reading of the Bill to give representation in the Legislature to the district of Nipissing. He described the development of the district, the enterprise of its inhabitants, and the extent of its natural resources, in glowing terms.

Mr. Creighton, while admitting the claims of Nipissing to representation, objected to the number of members in the House being increased. There should be a rearrangement with the view rather of reducing the total number

Mr. Armstrong said he was glad the Government had decided to give the district representation. The constituency adjoined his own, and he was quite satisfied that there was sufficient population to justify representation.

The Bill passed its second reading and was referred to a committee of the House.

The following Bills were introduced and read the first time:

Mr. Conmee—To amend the Ontario Election Act.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton)—To amend the Division Court Act.

Mr. Balfour moved for a return of a copy of any report made to the Government by the Prison Inspector and the Warden of the Central Prison of the result of their inquiries during the past year relating to prison labor in the United States.—Carried.

Mr. Waters, in moving the second reading of the Bill to enable widows and unmarried women to vote for members of the Legislative Assembly, said that it differed from that introduced by him last session in that the qualifications required in the present Bill were the same as those required for women voters at municipal elections. The machinery provided by the Bill was simple, and there would be no difficulty in working it side by side with that provided for the carrying out of the Manhood Suffrage Act. Women with property in nine cases out of ten manage it better than men. But we find a woman that is a ratepayer a good honest woman without a vote, while a worthless vagabond of a man, a drunken sot without a spark of manhood in his composition, is given a vote and put on a higher plane than this woman. It did not matter one particle to him or to any one else which side of politics women would vote for. On a former occasion the Attorney-General had voted for woman suffrage. He hoped the Attorney-General's Government would have the honor of granting woman's suffrage. What harm would arise from giving women the suffrage? What injury would it be to the public? The Attorney-General had told the ladies' deputation that he hoped to live to pass an Act in favor of this suffrage. Now he would say that we are not certain of a day's existence. (Applause.) Why not pass it now? Governments are not also assured of a continued existence, and it would be a matter of regret should Mr. Mowat's Government suffer defeat before a woman's suffrage bill is passed.

Mr. Dryden opposed the Bill on the ground that he believed there was no general feeling in favor of it. He held that the movement had gone far enough in the interests of the women. The ultimate effect of women entering into politics would be to bring forward the worst specimens of the sex, and to keep back the modest and honest women. The entrance of women into the political arena would be prejudicial to home life, of which there was already too little in this country. It would engender strife and dissension in the home circle, and set up one member of a family against another.

Mr. Metcalfe supported the Bill. He thought women ought to have a vote whether they wanted it or not.

Mr. A. M. Ross favored the principle of women having the franchise. He could not vote for the Bill because it contained a property qualification, after the House had in the case of men abolished the qualification.

Mr. Smith opposed the Bill because it discriminated against married women without property.

Mr. H. E. Clarke objected to female suffrage on the ground that it threatened the sanctity of the home and endangered the future of the race. Medical men knew what was comprehended by the second objection. Mr. Waters' Bill if passed must eventually and logically lead to womanhood suffrage. He did not think the country was prepared for this. He would vote against the Bill.

Mr. Hardy said Mr. Waters' Bill was, of course, less objectional than one giving womanhood suffrage, but he was afraid it would eventually lead to the broader measure. He agreed with the Treasurer that the House could not logically provide a property qualification for women after having swept it away from men. But he went further, and argued that any measure conferring the franchise on women would be prejudicial to the interests of society, and upon the ground of preserving the peace and interests of the home he would be justified in refusing to support the Bill. He read from an article by Mr. J. G. Holland, deprecating woman entering the field of politics. The proposal to give woman suffrage had been defeated in England, and on the continent it was not even listened to. They had had woman suffrage in Utah, and the women voted to perpetuate polygamy. In New Jersey they passed a measure of the kind, and were afterwards glad to repeal it. He moved in amendment to the motion

That all the words of the motion after "that" be omitted, and that there be inserted instead thereof the following

Thousands have not hitherto had votes at elections for the Imperial Parliament or for the Legislature of this Province or of any other Province of the Dominion, that while, on the one hand, the propriety of the extension of the suffrage to women has been strongly maintained, the opposite view has generally prevailed wherever representative Governments exist;

That if the right of female suffrage at Parliamentary elections were to be conceded the restrictions in Bill No. 60, entituled "An Act to enable widows and unmarried women to vote for members of the Legislative Assembly," as to the classes and qualifications of the women who would possess the suffrage are founded on no principle, and are repudiated by leading advocates of the movement;

That notwithstanding the restrictions which the said Bill purports to impose the principle of the Bill involves the extension of the franchise to all women on the same basis as the franchise for men,

That such an extension would double the number of the present electorate,

That there is reason for believing that it would even more than double such number, and might therefore involve the transfer to women of a preponderating voting power in all matters affecting the laws and institutions of the Province,

That such a far reaching extension of the franchise is a subject which the present electorate cannot be said to have ever dealt with or considered when selecting its representatives at the last election,

And that in all these circumstances it is the duty of this House as now constituted to refuse its assent to any measure involving the principle of female suffrage at parliamentary elections

Mr. Waters replied to the arguments against his Bill, and held that they were not well taken. Supposing that the women did want votes for prohibition purposes, they could not vote for prohibition till enfranchised by the Dominion. If they used the legislative franchise as a stepping-stone to get the Dominion franchise, so as to vote prohibition, it would be a grand result. He regretted to see so strong an amendment moved from the Government side, as it was an intimation to the women of the country that they need not expect to get the franchise from this Government.

Mr. Mowat said he did not so interpret the amendment. It simply intimated that it would be wrong for the House to pass such a measure, seeing that the country had not considered what it involved. He was still in favor of woman suffrage. The supposed consequences which would flow from it had been immensely exaggerated. It took but five minutes to deposit a ballot. He failed to see how five minutes spent in this way once every four years could endanger home life. Still, the House would be wrong to thrust woman suffrage either upon the women or upon the country till it was wanted. He failed to understand that in any constituency the question had been taken as a serious issue. Neither the men nor the women of the country were prepared for it. Twenty thousand petitioning for it means little out of a population of two millions. For the present, therefore, he felt it his duty to vote for the amendment.

Mr. Meredith said that if any portion of the women were to be enfranchised, then the whole of them must be enfranchised, and then there would be no escape from the legitimate result that women should be given seats in the Legislature. The Bill proposed what, in short, would be a revolution, the consequences of which no one could foresee. He regretted that all the members who opposed the Bill had not the courage to express their convictions. Where were there to be found among the women advocates of this measure the mothers of the country? It had been said that woman suffrage existed in Wyoming. It was no wonder; a woman was a rara avis there, and it was surprising the women had not been made governors. He would support the amendment. He hoped no one would give the Bill a complimentary vote. There was great danger in such a course.

Mr. Creighton wanted the agitation stopped just now, because it was a dangerous agitation.

The question was then put on the amendment, which was carried by 56 yeas to 22 nays on the following division:

YEAS—Messrs. Awrey, Ballantyne, Blezard, Blyth, Bronson, Chisholm, Clancy, Clarke, E. F. (Toronto), Clarke, H. E. (Toronto), Clarke (Wellington), Conmee, Craig, Creighton, Dance, Dryden, Eventurel, Fell, Fraser, Freeman, French, Gibson (Hamilton), Gibson (Huron), Gilmour, Gould, Guthrie, Hammell, Harcourt, Hardy, Hess, Hudson, Kerns, Lees, Lyon, McMahon, Master, Meredith, Monk, Morgan, Mowat, Murray, O'Connor, Pacaud, Phelps, Preston, Rayside, Ross (Huron), Ross (Middlesex), Smith (Frontenac), Smith (York), Snider, Stewart, Tooley, Whitney, Willoughby, Wood (Hastings), Wood (Brant)—56.

The following Bills were introduced and read the first time:

Mr. McMahon—To amend the General Road Companies Act.

The Bill respecting St. Jude's Church, Oakville (Mr. Kerns), was read the third time and passed.

The committee reported and asked leave to sit again.

Mr. Hardy moved the second reading of the Act respecting the formation of new counties. He explained that the Act did not apply to counties with less than 50,000 inhabitants. The Act proposed that the ratepayers entitled to vote at municipal elections might petition the Lieutenant-Governor to appoint commissions to consider the propriety of forming a new county.

Mr. Gibson (Huron) opposed the Bill. He said that only wire-pullers and office-seekers wanted the Bill passed. He was very sorry the Government had placed its friends in such a false position.

Mr. Allan said there was no feeling among the people at large in favor of this measure.

Mr. Ballantyne said that the Bill was simply retrogressive legislation. He would vote against the measure if it would defeat the Government.

The following Bills were introduced and read the first time:

Mr. Awrey—To amend the Act respecting references to arbitration.

Mr. Mowat—Respecting the powers of electric light companies. Also respecting the administration of justice in certain cases.

The followng Bills were read the third time and passed:

Respecting the limited liability of incorporated companies—The Attorney-General.

To amend the Agricultural and Arts Act—Mr. Drury.

Mr. Creighton moved for a return of all correspondence between the Department of the Attorney-General, or any officer employed by the Government, and any person or persons respecting the arrest and incarceration of one Hannah Boyd on a criminal charge, and the reported refusal of the authorities to permit legal counsel to have an opportunity of consulting or advising with her as to her defence. He said he did not wish to blame the Attorney-General personally for the manner in which Hannah Boyd had been treated in the endeavor of the authorities to elucidate the Galt poisoning case. He would like to know if it was true that Hannah Boyd had been refused permission to see her legal counsel.

Mr. Mowat said it had been discovered that a person suspected of the crime was in correspondence under a feigned name with this girl, also under a feigned name. The detectives believed that the persons who wished to see Hannah Boyd were employed by this man, hence the refusal of the authorities to permit communication between the parties. It would not be in the interest of the public to publish the correspondence.

Mr. Meredith said it had been avowed that the girl had been incarcerated in the hope that she would give information which would lead to the detection of the guilty parties. It was a gross breach of justice to refuse this girl permission to have counsel. Care ought to be taken that such a thing should not occur again.

Mr. Creighton, after commenting upon the unsatisfactory nature of the Attorney-General's explanation, and pointing out how dangerous it would be if the principle was recognized that persons arrested could be arbitrarily deprived of the aid of counsel, withdrew his motion.

Mr. Meredith asked if any compensation was paid this young woman.

Mr. Mowat could not remember.

The House adjourned at 6.05 p.m.

Baron de Hirsch on the Jewish Question.

The Paris correspondent of the London Jewish Chronicle telegraphs the following to that paper, under date of January 31st:

"The words of Baron de Hirsch have been incorrectly reported by the correspondent of the New York Herald. This eminent philanthropist has given too many proofs of his devotion to Judaism and to the Jews to be suspected of hostility to the cause he has defended with so much spirit and supported with so much munificence. Profoundly afflicted at seeing so many Jews reduced to extreme misery, by religious or racial hatred, he desired simply and plainly to tell the anti-Semites that, in persecuting the Jews, they were going directly against the object they seek, viz., an assimilation more or less complete; that it is not by violent proceedings they can attain this end, but, on the contrary, persecution stimulates religious sentiments. The baron declared: Remove every barrier, admit your Jewish compatriots to every right and advantage of social life, and there will be more chances for effecting the fusion which you appear desirous of witnessing. This is what happens in France and England, and indeed, wherever Jews enjoy the same rights as their fellow-citizens. Their intimate relations are on the increase, even mixed marriages are not rare in any class of society, and assimilation is progressively brought about by the natural order of things.

"Such you may declare with every assurance, are the ideas expressed by Baron de Hirsch in the course of the conversation reported by the New York Herald."

A DISMAL SWAMP STORY.

The Mysterious Huntress Two Young Men Tell About.

A Norfolk, Va., despatch says: Thomas J. Ballin and Andrew C. Woodhouse, young men, left their homes in the lower part of Norfolk county last Saturday for a hunt in an almost impenetrable portion of the famous Dismal Swamp. They returned yesterday, recounting their adventures and most singular experience up to that day. On Saturday night, while camped within half of a mile of Lake Drummond (situated in the centre of the swamp), and while engaged in building a fire, a snarl and then the peculiar cry of a wild cat were heard. Woodhouse started up to follow the cry, Ballin following with a blazing fagot to guide them. Suddenly a whirring sound was heard and a huge specimen of the swamp-cat fell at Woodhouse's feet from a large cypress tree. Upon examination the animal's head was found to have been pierced by a small arrow with a stone head. All attempts to discover the slayer were fruitless.

On Sunday while hunting around for lairs of the numerous animals that infest the swamp, some invisible being seemed to be engaged in frightening them away before the hunters could reach them, as if to prevent them engaging in such sport on the Sabbath. After a successful day's hunt on Monday, Ballin and his companion at night hied themselves to an old deserted hut, one side being almost entirely destroyed. The weather had turned very cold, and though a large fire had been built and they were wrapped in heavy overcoats, it was near midnight before they fell asleep. Near daybreak of Tuesday Woodhouse was awakened by feeling hot breath on his face, and by the light of the dying embers he saw a figure entirely clad in skins bending over him. The face was that of a young girl, her hair hanging in disorder from her head. In one hand she held a rough cross bow; the other was raised as if to warn Woodhouse not to stir. The face was of exceeding beauty, though sad. Her eyes beamed on him as if to say: "I am watching over you." Woodhouse was so startled that he did not attempt to rise or speak. The figure rose, and still pointing one hand toward him backed out from the hut and disappeared in the early dawn. Woodhouse immediately sprang up and discovered that Ballin and himself had been covered by skins to protect them from the piercing cold. After continuing their hunt on Tuesday they again went to the hut at nightfall, determined to keep awake and watch, but they were disappointed, for both fell asleep about midnight. Just before daybreak Woodhouse was awakened—this time by a gentle touch on his face, accompanied by the command to lie still. In words and intonation of voice which denoted a cultured mind he was warned to return home with his companion, and told to go to the most southern confines of the swamp—naming the spot—to dig three feet, and that he would find something she desired him to have. Then making him promise to lie still until she had left the hut, she again suddenly disappeared. Woodhouse immediately woke Ballin, and attempted to follow the young girl, but without success. Early on Wednesday morning both proceeded to the spot indicated, and, while not believing they would find anything, dug as requested. At the depth designated they found an old, half-rotten work-bag that must have been made a century ago. In it were several pieces of quaint jewellery, a number of incrusted Spanish dollars, gold doubloons, a miniature portrait and a moldy parchment paper marked with characters in an old-fashioned handwriting of bad spelling, describing where other treasures were concealed between there and the coast. Who the girl was, or how she became a wanderer in the swamp, is a mystery; but it is presumed that she is a descendant of the gang of pirates that utilized this section of the coast in hiding their spoils in the seventeenth century.

Cancer and Suicide.

It requires a good deal of courage sometimes to face the inevitable. When a man has his leg or even his head broken, he feels that there is a limit to the period of his suffering, and with "a stout upper lip" he takes the bitter with the sweet. But young Geisenheimer was told that he had a cancer. He knew that the disease would prove fatal. He could not creep away from it, nor run away from it, nor even stand his ground and fight it. He felt as though death had got a relentless grip on him and would never let go. Under the influence of that dread certainty of continuous suffering, every ray of hope shut out, his spirits gave way. At last he became desperate, bought a pistol, waited until he had closed up his earthly affairs, and then settled his debt to nature with a thirty-two calibre bullet. Women are much more heroic under such circumstances than men.—New York Herald.

Clay Purified by Electricity.

Electricity is being more and more used for the purification of kaolin and other porcelain clays. The clay is sifted on to a rapidly revolving horizontal plate, which is surrounded with powerful electro-magnets, which retain the particles of iron. From this the clay passes to a second plate which removes the last traces. The process is said to be comparatively cheap and very rapid, and since its introduction many clays hitherto rejected as containing too much iron have become of value for the manufacture of pottery.

DOMINION PARLIAMENT

The following Bills were introduced:

To incorporate the Northwest Junction & Lake of the Woods Railway Company—Mr. LaRiviere.

To incorporate the Supreme Court of the Independent Order of Foresters—Mr. Jamieson.

To incorporate the Northern Pacific & Manitoba Railway Company—Mr. Daly.

To further amend the Act incorporating the London & Canadian Loan & Agency Company—Mr. Cockburn.

Respecting the wires of telephone, telegraph and electric light companies in the city of Toronto—Mr. Small.

Mr. Costigan, on the orders of the day having been called, drew attention to newspaper reports that part of the Secret Service money of Canada, of which he was supposed to have control, had been expended in paying Le Caron, the informer in the Parnell investigation, for his services as a spy. He never heard of Le Caron till he appeared in connection with the Parnell trial, and never had had any connection with him whatever.

On motion to go into supply,

Mr. Laurier called the attention of the House to the question of the fisheries, and the position in which the relations between Canada and the United States stand with reference to that question. He said that at this moment there was no more important question to the people of Canada. It was a matter upon which the country had the right to expect the Government and Parliament to speak with no uncertain sound. When the hon. gentleman from Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies), asked whether the Government intended to continue the modus vivendi, the answer was the ever convenient and ever serviceable one—under consideration. It must have been then evident to every member of the House that the Government had no policy to announce; that they would continue, as upon other questions, irresolute, hesitating, until the time for deliberation would be past and the time for action would be well nigh gone. Under such circumstances, when the Government refused to stand up to the duty of the hour, it became the duty of the Opposition to step to the front and clear the way, to show what was the duty of the hour, and what course should be followed in the interests of the country at large. What, he asked, was the situation at this moment? The President of the United States was authorized to close American ports to our ships, nay more, to prevent the importation into the United States of any goods coming from Canada. When we consider that the exports from Canada last year exceeded forty millions of dollars it was easy to understand the magnitude of the evil which would be done to Canada if this policy were enforced. Here were two nations, both the offspring of the same Motherland, side by side, with every inducement to intimacy and friendship, on the verge of commercial war. It was well known that no less an authority than Sir Charles Tupper stated that the line which separated commercial war from actual war was very thin. Even if he did not go as far as Sir Charles Tuppen, even if nothing more than commercial war was threatened, the situation was a most deplorable one. For the present situation the Government of Canada was largely responsible. He would not say completely responsible. Justice and fairness compelled him to add that in many things the Government of the United States were as blameable as that of Canada. Were he an American on the floor of the Senate, he would protest against the course they had taken, against their lack of fairness and generosity; but he was a Canadian, and it was his duty to point out the way in which the Government of Canada had gone wrong. The Opposition still believed that the twelve years of reciprocity had been a golden era for Canada. It was a matter of history that that treaty was abrogated because the Government and the people of Canada, in common with a large part of the civilized world, in the great national struggle of the United States had not sympathized with the side on which there was right and justice. Times had changed since then, however. The England of to-day was no longer the England of 1861. It was largely, if not altogether, a democratic country. The England of 1861 was the same as the England of 1775, which resisted the effort of the United States for independence. He was at a loss to understand why Canada, which was a purely democratic country, did not throw her sympathy with the North and against slavery in the great struggle of the American war. Had we done so, we would have had their friendship in return, but one of their first acts after the close of the war was to cut off reciprocal trade with the United States, no doubt in consequence of the unfriendly attitude our Government and people assumed towards them at that time. That, he believed, was the first mistake our Government committed in their treatment of our neighbors. In 1885 we refused to ship American fish in bond. We seized their schooners for alleged and trivial violations of the construction we put upon the convention of 1818—a construction so narrow, and in some cases so inhuman, as to put schooners back to sea without giving them the privilege of buying food or other necessaries. They expected by this course to bring down the Americans, but instead we were menaced by the Retaliation Bill of 1887. At this juncture it was well that there was in the United States a true Canadian, whose name was received with jeers when mentioned in the House last year, who stepped to the front and did what should have been done by the Canadian Government long before. He constituted himself an ambassador to Secretary Bayard, and had an interview with him, which ultimately led to a conference between that official and Sir Charles Tupper. The name of that Canadian was Erastus Wiman, and on the admission of Sir Charles Tupper himself in the House, he it was who took the first step towards the conference. Commissioners were subsequently appointed and they met at Washington, and Sir Charles Tupper proposed to settle the question by a treaty giving freer intercourse between the two countries. It was rejected because, as he himself stated, of the irritation existing on account of the treatment American fishermen had received from the Canadian authorities. He (Mr. Laurier) would urge the Government to reverse that policy of harshness, and endeavor, not by acts of violence, but by peaceful means, to negotiate with our neighbors. He was quite aware that for daring to say that in this international question our Government were sometimes wrong and another nation right he would bring down the whole Conservative press on his head; but even as the British Ministry of 1775 lived to repent, as Lord Chatham foretold that they would, their action with reference to the then American Colonies, so would the present Government of this country see the folly of their policy in this great international question. He closed by moving the following amendment:

Resolved, that in view of the rejection by the Senate of the United States of the Washington Treaty of 1888, and the unfortunate and regrettable differences existing between Canada and the United States on the fishery question, this House is of opinion that steps should be taken at an early day by the Government of Canada for a satisfactory adjustment of such differences, and the securing of unrestricted freedom in the trade relations of the two countries, and that in any negotiations entered upon for such purposes, Canada should be directly represented by some one nominated by its Government. That in the meantime, and to prevent such negotiations being unfavorably entered upon, and to afford evidence of the anxious desire of Canada to promote good feeling, and remove all possible subjects of controversy, this House is of opinion that the modus vivendi proposed on behalf of the British Government to the Government of the United States with respect to the fisheries should be continued in operation during the ensuing fishing season.

Sir John Macdonald said it would have been more courteous to the Government side if the leader of the Opposition had informed them of the wide range which his amendment proposed to take. He had brought in three subjects, namely, the modus vivendi, our part in making foreign treaties, and the fishery question. He congratulated the hon. gentleman on the ability with which he had proved that in our negotiations with the United States we had been all wrong and the Opposition had been altogether right, and he did not lose sight of the hon. gentleman's advice to us, four millions of people, to adopt a conciliatory tone towards over sixty millions of our neighbors. But he could not agree with the hon. gentleman, because he did not believe that we were wrong. We have been right from the beginning. We were right in principle and right in practice. (Cheers.) But the hon. gentleman, who, like other cosmopolitans, was a friend to every country but his own, comes down just a few days before the advent of a new American Administration, with their policy undeclared, and says: "Go on your knees to Harrison and Blaine, and say to them that we were wrong and they were right," and after having given up everything in the world and having admitted that we had acted inhumanely towards American fishermen, ask them to make a new treaty. But the United States would say: "What is the use of making a new treaty when you have given up everything that you were contending for?" That was not the way that treaties were made, or that this Government proposed to make treaties. On the contrary, we must stand upon our dignity and upon our rights. He hoped and believed, from information received from an unofficial source, that the incoming United States Government would not do anything hostile to Canada. The modus vivendi provided that, in order to give an opportunity for consideration of a treaty, Canada offered for a reasonable fee the right to American fishermen to buy bait, tranship cargoes, make repairs, etc., in Canadian ports. With commendable prevision, power had been given to keep the modus vivendi alive till February, 1890, so as to afford a full opportunity for considering a treaty. He hardly needed to assure the House that upon the very first intimation by the United States of their willingness to enter upon enlarged relations with us, he would be most happy to do so, as well as to negotiate upon the more burning question of the fisheries. He protested against the statement that in the war between the North and South the sympathies of the Canadian Government and people were with the South. There could be no doubt that the sympathies of the masses and classes of England were with the South, but in Canada it was different. The Canadian Government were anxious to carry out the strictest neutrality, and were thanked again and again by the United States Government for their conduct. Our borders were lined with militiamen in order to prevent this country from being made the base of operations by Southerners. The cry that the reciprocal treaty of 1854 was terminated because of Canadian sympathy with the South was a mere pretext. The treaty was abrogated partly on account of the feeling against England and partly on account of the pressure brought upon the United States Government by American farmers and others, whose interests suffered from Canadian competition. The resolution would meet with the condemnation of the House and the condemnation of the country. He believed he knew the people of Canada, and he believed they would resist anything like the humiliation of their national honor. Servility was not a part of the people of Canada. They would rather put up with what they felt to be wrongs than with interference with their trade. He knew he spoke for the majority of the people when he said they were anxious and willing, more than anxious, to enter into the most free relations with the United States as far as the interests of Canada would allow. The hon. gentleman knew perfectly well that the resolution he proposed would meet with the indignant opposition not only of the House, but of the whole people of Canada.

Mr. Mills said that Sir John Macdonald had contradicted his former Finance Minister. Last session Sir Charles Tupper declared that the chief reason the reciprocity treaty was abrogated was because of Canadian sympathy with the South in their national struggle. He could not remember the Premier having been compared to Judas, and attributed that impression rather to a vivid imagination than to a retentive memory. Every clause of the treaty of 1871 to which the Liberals took exception, they still believed were not in the interest of the country.

Mr. Weldon (Albert) introduced a Bill to extend the provisions of the Extradition Act. He explained that the Bill proposed to legislate in the only direction in regard to extradition matters in which we can legislate outside of a treaty arrangement, namely, in the direction of driving out from amongst us those criminals who have fled from a foreign country to seek an asylum with us. Whatever view we might take of the criminal law, we would all admit that the arm of avenging justice was shorn of its strength when the criminal had crossed the boundary line into another country, where he could not be prosecuted. Under the existing treaty with the United States, the Ashburton Treaty of 1842, there were only five extraditable crimes, namely, murder, arson, assault with intent, piracy, and the commercial crime of forgery. The great increase in the commercial intercourse of the two countries since the framing of that Act had given rise to a greatly increased variety in commercial crimes, and there was a general desire that the scope of the Ashburton Treaty in this respect should be greatly enlarged. The Bill provides that in the event of the demand by States with which Great Britain has no extradition treaty, or where the treaty, if one exists, is inadequate, the Canadian Government may surrender the criminals who are enjoying an asylum here from the commission of certain flagrant crimes. A clause provided that the expense should be borne by the State which makes the demand, and the list of offences made extraditable included all the graver crimes. The Bill did not in any way impair or invade the right of asylum to all political offenders, which was secured to them by law in all parts of the British dominions. The Bill proposed to have a retroactive effect as regards criminals now enjoying asylum in Canada.

The Bill was read a first time.

To incorporate the Moosejaw, Battleford & Edmonton Railway Company—Mr. McDonnell.

To incorporate the Saskatchewan Railway & Mining Company—Mr. McCarthy.

To incorporate the Edmonton & Florenceville Railway Company—Mr. Landry (Kent).

To amend the charter of the Great Northwest Central Railway Company—Mr. Daly.

Respecting the Kingston & Pembroke Railway Company—Mr. Bell.

Respecting conditional relief of first offenders—Mr. Thompson.

Relating to bills of lading—Mr. Thompson.

Mr. Brown moved that the House resolve itself into committee on Wednesday next to consider the Bill to make further provision for the prevention of cruelty to animals. He said that this step was necessary in order to bring the Bill again before the House. When the Bill was considered he would make such explanations as would remove the objections taken, or would consent to modifications of it.

Mr Tisdale moved the six months' hoist.

The House divided on Mr. Brown's motion, which was carried on a vote of 96 yeas to 93 nays.

Mr. Haggart introduced a Bill to amend the Act respecting the postal service. In doing so he enumerated the changes proposed to be made by the Bill in the present law. Among these was one compelling steamboats navigating in Canadian waters to carry mails and persons travelling with mails at a charge to be fixed by the Governor-in-Council. Another clause proposed to bring decoy letters within the category of letters which it is punishable to steal. Another clause rendered the law more stringent in regard to sending publications or photographs of an immoral nature through the mails. It was proposed to increase the rate on registered letters to that collected in Great Britain and the United States, and a clause was inserted giving the Postmaster General power to prescribe a rate. The Bill increased the weight of letters which may be carried for 3 cents from one-half ounce to one ounce. Another clause raised the rate on drop letters from 1 cent per half ounce to 2 cents per ounce, or under. A rate of postage would be placed on newspapers and periodicals issued less frequently than once in every seven days of 1 cent per pound in weight.

Mr. Jones asked if it was intended to deal in any way with insufficiently prepaid letters, so that they would not suffer the delay consequent upon being sent to the dead-letter office.

Mr. Haggart said that all such letters would be forwarded to their destination, and a double rate of postage would be imposed.

The Bill was read the first time.

Mr. Macdonald (Huron), in resuming the debate on Mr. Laurier's amendment in supply with reference to the fisheries, said that the resolution brought up several important subjects which would before long have to be decided along the lines of the policy adopted by the Liberal party. He impressed the necessity of Canadian politicians giving up petty party bickering and acting unitedly for the welfare of the country.

Mr. Jones said that large quantities of Canadian fish must go to the United States no matter what price was paid for it. Canada could never be developed except with reciprocity. From time to time the Government had been compelled to back down with reference to their policy towards the United States. The Minister of Justice denounced as treasonable the proposal to put on the free list trees and shrubs last session, and shortly afterwards took that very step.

Sir John Thompson combatted the charge of the Opposition that the Government had put an unwarrantable construction upon the Treaty of 1818 in their refusal of the right to tranship. That interpretation was not new, and it was put in force by the Americans themselves by their termination of the fishery articles of the Washington Treaty. The Opposition had attached undue importance to the intervention of Mr. Wiman. It was not correct that that gentleman had been the medium through which the negotiations were opened between the two countries. On the contrary, before a single proposal had been made by Mr. Wiman, despatches had passed between the United States and the British Government, and between the British Government and Canada, suggesting negotiations covering in the widest sense the questions of trade as well as the fishery question.

The House divided on Mr. Laurier's amendment, which was lost on the following division: 65 yeas, 108 nays.

DAN O'CONNELL.

The Summing Up of a Remarkable Man.

In all the separate phases of his life and action, which were numerous beyond the common, O'Connell was remarkable, but their combination into a whole, and the character he presents to us as a human being, are more worthy than any amongst his separate gifts, brilliant as they were, of study and of admiration. In many famous persons the acted life seems to be detached from the inner man. These belong to the category of responsible beings, but it is hard to say how far that responsibility was conscious and applied, how far, nay, how much further, dormant and forgotten. Their life is not woven into continuity by a solid and persistent purpose. Such was not the case with this great child of nature. Nothing in him was little, nothing was detached or heterogeneous. In the assemblage of all his powers he was one, indivisible and deeply cut. No day of his life could be severed from the rest without touching the essence and demolishing the whole. If he ever seems to wander into violence these were the wanderings of a moment; his boomerang soon came home. Next to his religion and indeed under the direct inspiration of his religion, his country was for him all in all. He had room for other genuine interests in his large and sympathetic nature, but these revolved around his patriotism, like the satellites about a mighty planet. For who can any longer doubt that some debt is still due to him; that he was, to say the least, both over-censured and undervalued? By many he was taken to be unquestionably a ruffian, probably a public swindler of his countrymen. Besides being a great and a good, he was also a disappointed man. The sight of his promised land was not given to his longing eyes. But as a prophet of a coming time he fulfilled his mission. It seems safe to say that few indeed have gone to their account with a shorter catalogue of mistaken aims or wasted opportunities, and not only that he did much, but that he could not have done more.—W. E. Gladstone in the Nineteenth Century.

Don't Toss the Baby.

The throwing a baby into the air and catching him again is always a risky practice, certain though the tosser may be of his quickness of eye and sureness of hand. A sudden and unexpected movement of the child in his mid-air flight may result in a cruel fall. A gay young father snatched up his baby boy one morning and tossed him to the ceiling. Twice the little fellow went flying through the air and came down safely into the waiting arms. The third time the excited child gave a spring of delight as his father's hands released him, plunged forward, and, pitching over the father's shoulder, fell head downward to the floor. When the poor baby came out of the stupor in which he lay for hours, it was found that, although no bones had been broken, the brain had sustained an injury that would in all probability render the child an imbecile. Another baby snatched from the floor and tossed into the air received a fatal wound in the top of the head from the pointed ornament of a chandelier. Still another child slipped between her father's hands as he caught at her in her downward flight, and although his frenzied grasp on the baby's arm saved her from falling to the ground, it wrenched the muscles and sinews so cruelly that the girl's arm was shrunken and practically useless to her all her life. These are extreme cases, but the fact of their occurring at all should be enough to warn one from the habit of relinquishing one's hold on a child when tossing it.—Harper's Bazaar.

Colors and Insanity.

Colors have considerable influence on the physical nature both of plants and animals. Sundry diseases grow better or worse according to the color of the apartments occupied by the patients. Violet, among others, is said to have a very beneficial effect on the health. Recent experiments made by a Swiss doctor have shown that lunatics may be treated by colors. The doctor placed one of his patients who was suffering from melancholia and refused to eat in a well-lighted room papered with red; in three hours the man was quite lively and ate with avidity. Another time he locked a raving maniac in a blue chamber, and within a few hours he became quite calm after all other methods had failed.—Medical Register.

Patience with the Living.

Sweet friend, when thou and I are gone
Beyond earth's weary labor,
When small shall be our need of grace
From comrade or from neighbor;
Passed all the strife, the toil, the care,
And done with all the sighing,
What tender truth shall we have gained,
Alas! by simply dying?

Then lips too chary of their praise
Will tell our merits over,
And eyes too swift our faults to see
Shall no defect discover.
Then hands that would not lift a stone
Where stones were quick to cumber
Our steep hill path, will scatter flowers
Above our pillowed slumber.

Sweet friend, perchance both thou and I,
Ere love is past forgiving,
Should take the earnest lesson home—
Be patient with the living.
To-day's repressed rebuke may save
Our blinding tears to-morrow;
Then patience—e'en when keenest edge
May whet a nameless sorrow.

'Tis easy to be gentle when
Death's silence shames our clamor,
And easy to discern the best
Through memory's mystic glamor
But wise it were for thee and me,
Ere love is past forgiving,
To take the tender lesson home—
Be patient with the living.

CANUCKS CHARACTERIZED.

They Are a Distinct Type, Neither English nor Yankee.

(Charles Dudley Warner in March Harper's.)

I had been told that the Canadians are second-hand Englishmen. No estimate could convey a more erroneous impression. A portion of the people have strong English traditions and loyalties to institutions, but in manner and in expectations the Canadians are scarcely more English than the people of the United States; they have their own colonial development, and one can mark already with tolerable distinctness a Canadian type which is neither English nor American. This is noticeable especially in the women. The Canadian girl resembles the American in escape from a purely conventional restraint and in self-reliance, and she has, like the English, a well-modulated voice and distinct articulation. In the cities, also, she has taste in dress and a certain style which we think belongs to the New World. In features and action a certain modification has gone on, due partly to climate and partly to greater social independence. It is unnecessary to make comparisons, and I only note that there is a Canadian type of woman. But there is a great variety in Canada, and in fact a remarkable racial diversity. The man of Nova Scotia is not at all the man of British Columbia or Manitoba. The Scotch in old Canada have made a distinct impression in features and speech. And it may be said generally in Eastern Canada that the Scotch element is a leading and conspicuous one in the vigor and push of enterprise and the accumulation of fortune. The Canadian men, as one sees them in official life, at the clubs, in business, are markedly a vigorous, stalwart race, well made, of good stature and not seldom handsome. This physical prosperity needs to be remembered when we consider the rigorous climate and the long winters; these seem to have at least one advantage—that of breeding virile men. The Canadians generally are fond of out-door sports and athletic games, of fishing and hunting, and they give more time to such recreations than we do. They are a little less driven by the business goad. Abundant animal spirits tend to make men good-natured and little quarrelsome. The Canadians would make good soldiers. There was a time when the drinking habit prevailed very much in Canada, and there are still places where they do not put water enough in their grog, but temperance reform has taken as strong a hold there as it has in the United States. The feeling about the English is illustrated by the statement that there is not more aping of English ways in Montreal and Toronto clubs and social life than in New York, and that the English superciliousness or condescension as to colonists, the ultra-English manner, is ridiculed in Canada, and resented with even more warmth than in the United States. The amusing stories of English presumption upon hospitality are current in Canada, as well as on this side. All this is not inconsistent with pride in the Empire, loyalty to its traditions and institutions, and even a considerable willingness (for human nature is pretty much alike everywhere) to accept decorative titles. But the underlying fact is that there is a distinct feeling of nationality, and it is increasing.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A Challenge.

To the Editor of The Advance.

Dear Sir,—will you kindly give space in your valuable paper for the following:

There has been considerable sporting done on the south line, Artemesia, in regard to fast sawing by James McDonald and J. McLean. Sometime ago they tried to see how fast they could cut a cord and succeeded in cutting it in twenty minutes. Since then their boasting has known no bounds. They have repeatedly expressed their desire of meeting other crack sawyers in a sawing match, providing they took another saw different to the one they use, which is a Diamond. I have been requested by Louis Frook and T. Ferguson to send the above mentioned loafers a direct challenge on their behalf. They say they are willing to try them on a bet of $10 that they can cut a cord of wood in less time, or any given time, between fifteen minutes and an hour, and take a different saw to the one they use, the race to take place before the first of April. In case the saw used by either party would break in the race each party would claim his own money. They have already beaten the South line time 8 minutes. We want them to either put up or shut up.

Flesherton Station.

Correspondence of The Advance.

The past week here has been one of activity so far as general business is concerned. As for grain, oats has been the principle grain delivered for the last ten days. It would be safe to say it was the week of the season in that line, and still they are coming. For square timber it is something unprecedented in the history of the station for the amount that has been delivered so far.

The Bute brothers have just completed a shipment of horses for the Northwest and are awaiting a palace car to conduct them thither, and fine specimens they are. One of the gentlemen is going to remain with us and purchase another carload.

There are four car loads of horses intended to be shipped from here this month. Farmers, look alive to your interest and get rid of your surplus stock.

Mr. McClurg, of Orangeville, paid Mr. Wood a visit one day last week. He is a young man of noble apperance and looks well, so the girls say. May he come again.

One day last week our Town Fathers went out to our Township Fathers in Flesherton, praying that a portion of S. S. No 3 be added to No. 10 S. S., but our township fathers could not see the point. I would just say to our town fathers, take a leaf from the spider.

Will some one get a few bills out and call a meeting of the farmers together to to talk creamery, as this is the season to make preparations. What do you think Mr. Cook?

Friend Spirit is on the war path here, and what he is after I can't tell. Can you?

Friend Granger has been limping around here for the last week, much to his discomfort, with an injured knee.

Mr. W. Wright left here on Monday, en route for Hamilton, to attend a meeting of the Grand Lodge.

There has been considerable said about a certain masher that is here just now. Who is she?

From our own Correspondent.

Rev. Mr. Watts has been holding special services in the church here for some time with much success. Mr. Watts is a whole souled man and we wish him much success in his labor.

Another lady came to our village last week and is living on one of our citizens. She refuses to tell her name. But she says it is not because she has done anything wrong. Such people as this should be looked after and not be allowed to impose in the public in this way.

Mrs. S. Carruthers left last week for Proton th Township, where he intends residing for some time. Also Miss Mandi McLean and Mr. A. McLean left last week for Washington territory. We wish them much success.

A serious accident occurred last week which might have proven fatal. A boy by the name of Holmes, who lives near Eugenia, was in our village, and while playing in the grist mill with one of the mill boys, went to the front door and fell down a distance of about ten feet upon the hard gravel and stones. No one saw him fall, but he was found a few minutes later lying unconscious. He was picked up and taken care of, but did not come to his senses for some time. We are glad to learn that he is doing well, but it will be some time before he will fully recover.

Mr. R. Gilhay, of Epping, occupied the Methodist church here on Sunday evening last.

Miss Mary Smith, of Flesherton is visiting friends in this vicinity at present.

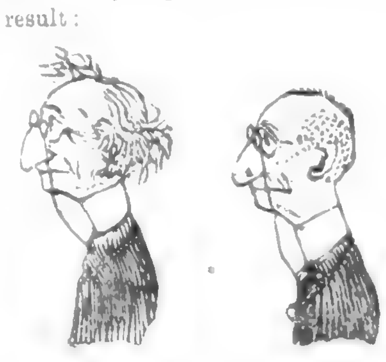
A LIBEL NAILED.

If anything were wanting to convince the public that Grip is a base Liberal publication, it would be found in the following horrible libel published in last week's issue of that journal. It claims that Sir John McDonald visited the House of Commons barber shop a few days ago, with the following result:



BEFORE AND AFTER.

Our own artist has reproduced Grip's pictures, to the dot. Grip is with The World, fishing for libel suits.

With the cessation of assisted passages from the Old Country a better class of immigrants are secured for this country. Among poor mechanics and impecunious nonentities the falling off in immigration returns is particularly noticeable. A class such as Canada has long wanted and never heretofore secured is the receivable outcome of the late legislation against assisted emigration, viz., an industrious, ambitious people with a little money and what may be termed colonization energy. The steamship "Parisian" sailed from England on Thursday last with a thousand passengers, 75 per cent. of whom were young farmers from 18 to 30 years of age. This proves that the endeavors of the Toronto Trades and Labor Council, in conjunction with other bodies, to make the English mind understand Canadian requirements, are meeting success and bearing valuable fruit.

At the spring Assizes which opened in Ottawa on Friday last the Grand Jury stated that a crime for which a certain man Hendricks was being tried, was directly traceable to liquor, and expressed their opinion that the time had arrived for the introduction of a prohibition measure. Were the whole Dominion constituted one grand Grand Jury they would pronounce the same verdict.

A Streetsville woman placed a box of pills upon a shelf in her pantry not long since. A few days afterwards some mice nibbled away the pasteboard partition and devoured every blessed pill in the box. Since then their trips to the pantry have been like angels visits—few and far between—and it is thought that the digestive organs of the mice are in a rather dilapidated condition and they have gone south for the benefit of their health. The matron aforesaid hopes their visit will be prolonged indefinitely, and suggests the liberal use of pills as a safe purgative for mice.—Streetsville Review.

Mr Wm. Higgins, of Melancthon, informs us that on Thursday last, while he was grooming his horses in the stable, his little daughter, aged about [illegible] years, who was passing through the feed room in front of the horses, was grabbed by the shoulder by one of the animals and dragged through the [illegible] [illegible] Higgins to the rescue and she was carried safely out. The marks of the horse's teeth were very deep and the injuries painful, but no serious results are anticipated. What puzzles Mr. Higgins, is to know how the horse dragged the girl through the feed hole so quickly.—Shelburne Economist.

GOLD CRAZY CALIFORNIA!

A Big Discovery to the South of San Diego.

EVERYBODY RUSHING TO THE MINES.

A special despatch from Los Angeles, Cal., dated March 7th, says: The gold discoveries in Lower California have created intense excitement in every town in the southern part of the State. The Santa Clara district, where the crowds are rushing, is 150 miles south of San Diego and 40 miles west of Ensenada. All along the line thousands are en route to the fields. At San Diego the streets are filled with strangers outfitting for the mines and with wagons and pack mules loaded with miners' outfits. An average of 600 men a day have left for the mines for the last four days, and yesterday the number was much larger. Waiters at the hotels and restaurants have largely left, and two-thirds of the force on the Cuyamaca Railroad are gone. The best indications regarding the value of the mines are that no one has returned except to replenish "grub stakes." The telegraphers have also joined the prospectors. James Kerrane, of Los Angeles, returned from the camp last night. He said: There are already over 1,000 men on the ground. The stuff brought out is placer gold and light and flakey. The valley in which the mine was discovered has three well defined gold quartz lodes. They descend from the mountains above in separate gulches. The gulch to the north is the one in which the greatest find has been made. Above are to be found croppings of slate and porphyry. A tracing has been made of one lode 1,100 feet from the upper side of the valley into the mountains. At present in the valley four dry washers are located, only one of which is in operation. A great many rockers and ground sluices are being worked. The dirt is easily handled and the richest of returns are had in some instances. I saw one man who had knocked out $200 in four hours. But above all things the prices of provisions are simply outrageous. I paid $5 for a 50 pound sack of flour, $3 50 for a 10 pound sack of oatmeal, and drinks are two bits a piece. San Diego has about gone to a man to the gold country. Four telegrams have been received in this city requesting that hotel waiters be sent at once to San Diego, as none could be had there at any price. The guests were left to get their own meals out of the kitchen for one entire day.

A despatch direct from the camp says: New arrivals poured in in a constant stream to-day. A company of Mexican rural guards arrived this morning and the commandant put the camp under martial law and disarmed every one, the arms to be returned when they leave the camp. I have seen to-day over $20,000 in dust and nuggets. Few take the trouble to wash, simply dig hard pan and pick out the grains and nuggets with a horn spoon. I believe many paying quartz leads will be worked. One lode can be traced 1,100 feet up the mountain. In washing, the dirt is easily handled, as the gold is light and flakey. Reports of a large find at Real Del, Castello, just came in this evening. The camp is wild over the find of a Mexican named Jesus Roselle. He came yesterday morning and took a claim. This evening his clean up weighs $1,350. The camp is orderly, there are ruffians, but all work. Teams ply regularly between Ensenada and here, the charge is $50 each. Provisions are scarce, flour sells at $40 a sack and everything in the same proportion. Large stocks of goods are reported on the road. Five women have arrived and are now working neighboring claims and doing well. The night are cold. There are a few dug outs, but no one is willing to stop work to build shelter. The whole camp sleeps on the ground. There are 1,000 people and more are coming every hour.

A MISERABLE END

Young Man Poisons Himself to Escape the Consequences of His Crime.

A last (Thursday) night's Lansing, Mich., despatch says: Edward M. Marietta, a Lansing man, decoyed from Canada to Detroit yesterday by means of a letter which the officers induced Mrs. Emma Parker to write, and who was wanted here for criminally assaulting a 9-year-old girl named Kettie Hedges, was brought home dead by Deputy Sheriff Cook last night. Marietta induced his brother-in law to bail him for the offence against the Hedges girl, and last week fled to Canada on money furnished by Mrs. Parker, who was to join him later. She was shadowed to Detroit on Monday and there arrested. An officer induced her to send a letter to Marietta at Chatham, telling him she was ill in Detroit, and afterward telephoned him to cross the river. He was arrested as he stepped off the ferry boat. The officer started for home with both his prisoners on the train last evening. When half an hour's ride from Detroit Marietta remarked that he did not feel well. A drink of water seemed to revive him, but in a few moments he again complained of illness, which was not so readily relieved. Suddenly his limbs stiffened out, and he then confessed that just before leaving Detroit he swallowed a dose of strychnine, purchased in Windsor for that purpose if arrested. He grew rapidly worse, experiencing convulsions frightful to witness, and died shortly before the train reached Plymouth. Marietta was 26 years old, and leaves a young wife.

A Clergyman Deposed.

At the Ash Wednesday service of Trinity Church Bishop Coxe deposed from the ministry of this Episcopal diocese the Rev. Sidney Wilbur. This action is taken in carrying into effect the verdict of the Ecclesiastical Court, which found Wilbur guilty of not only violations of the canon laws, but gross immorality. Wilbur was called three times by the Bishop, but did not appear. He was formerly rector at Suspension Bridge, but is now supposed to be in Florida. His name was connected with a scandal two years ago. Buffalo Courier.

HOW HE GOT A MOTHER-IN-LAW.

Young Nunan Sought and Found the Long Missing Mother of His Betrothed.

A New Haven despatch says: In the quiet wedding in the little village of Terryville, Litchfield County, this afternoon, of Thomas E. Nunan, a reporter for the New Haven Morning News, and Jennie Hart, the adopted daughter of J. T. Hart, a wealthy resident of Kensington, culminates in a love story in which a search for the mother of the bride was an important episode.

In South Coventry, in 1876, a Mr. Hayden died, and his wife, left destitute, had to go to the poor house. Their 6-year-old daughter was adopted by Mr. Hart from an orphans' home in Boston, in which she had been placed by her grandfather. Mother and daughter had not since heard of each other. Mr. Hart subsequently died and left part of his estate to his adopted daughter, who took the name of Jennie Hart. She went to reside, in 1885, with James Woodruff, a brother-in-law of Mr. Hart, at Terryville.

Here she met young Nunan, who then conducted the Terryville Eagle. The paper had but a brief existence, and when Nunan deserted the Eagle's nest he decided while looking for a position to try and find the mother of Miss Hart, to whom he had become attached. He knew only that the daughter had been taken from Boston and her name had been Hayden.

A visit to most of the institutions was made in vain before Nunan struck the Little Wanderer's Home on Baldwin place. Here it was said the rules forbade giving information, as in a majority of cases it was well that such children should not know who their parents were. It was subsequently found, however, that she had been received from South Coventry in 1876 and thither the reporter went. This village was next visited, and a long search resulted in finding the mother at Rockville. She had married again, and had three children by her second husband, George Eldridge. But she had to continue working in the mill at that place.

The mother was overjoyed to learn of her long lost daughter. She, too, had sought fruitlessly for her offspring with a photograph of her taken when very young. It was shown to many but none had seen the lost one.

Nunan in executive session told his intended bride of having found her mother. They went next day to Rockville and visited the mill where her mother was working. An affecting scene followed when the mother was called out into the office. Soon after the Eldridge children were caressed by a sister whom they had never seen before, and the sister, besides her mother, found relatives of whom she had never heard.

The intimacy has been maintained, and the young man received the mother's blessing when he led to the altar the daughter whose hand he had earned by the long search.

STUCK TILL HE DIED.

The Horrible Death of a Man who Fell from a Charleston Dock.

A Charleston, N.C., despatch says: John D. Wrede, a drummer for a commission house in this city, met a horrible death the other night. He left his home at about 9 o'clock, and was not heard from till the next day, when his body was found in the mud at Hunter's dock, on the eastern water front. The body was buried in the mud up to the arms, which were extended. It is supposed that he fell from the wharf into the dock, and while trying to extricate himself sank so deep in the mud as to be unable to get out. At that hour, 10 p.m., the tide was low, and at high tide there is not over three feet of water over the spot where he perished. He must have been slowly drowned by the rising tide. There are residences within 100 yards of the place where he was found, but his cries were unheeded. He must have been alive for four hours before the tide reached his mouth and drowned him. Wrede is the fourth victim who has perished there in the same way.

A Baby Farmer Sentenced.

In the High Court of Justiciary, Edinburgh, on Monday, Jessie King, or Macpherson, was tried on a charge of murdering, at different times during last year and the previous year, three babies entrusted to her to bring up. King in her declaration admitted suffocating the children, with each of whom she had received a premium but when placed at the bar she denied the crimes. One charge was withdrawn, and as the jury returned a unanimous verdict of guilty on the other two charges, prisoner was condemned to death on 11th March. On hearing the sentence the prisoner almost fainted, and was carried downstairs by a policeman and was heard moaning by the people in the court. She afterwards exclaimed to the Police Inspector, "Oh, to be hanged! What a death!" adding that she expected only eighteen months' or two years' imprisonment.—Trowbridge Chronicle, February 8th.

THEY DIED TOGETHER.

Extraordinary Double Suicide of Two Young English Girls.

AFRAID OF A SEVERE SCOLDING.

They Tie Themselves Together and Drown in Each Other's Arms.

(London Edition of the N. Y. Herald.)

Two girls tied themselves together and drowned themselves in the Birmingham Canal on Sunday night. The particulars of the tragedy are without parallel in the annals of self destruction. The pathos of the case and the insignificance of the events which led the unfortunate girls to do away with themselves are circumstances which would be regarded as the wildest flights of fancy if narrated in the pages of some latter-day romance. The two girls were mere children. Their names were Sarah Ann Ward and Elizabeth Wylde, 17 and 16 years of age respectively; and, as far as can be learned, they were both of excellent character. Both were domestic servants, both were employed in the same house, both started out for a holiday on Sunday forenoon without a cloud to shadow their prospects of enjoying themselves. The next morning their dead bodies were dragged out of the sluggish waters of the Birmingham Canal, where they had drowned themselves together but a few hours before. When found the two bodies were tied together with a red woollen wrap, and the arms of each were entwined around the other as though they had which never loosened even when the cold waters closed over them and hushed their stifled gasps in death. From the evidence given at the inquest it seems that the girls were driven to their mutual death through fear of being reprimanded by their employer. They got leave only to stay out until 4 o'clock in the afternoon, but when it came to 8 o'clock and they had not yet returned to their home, they seemed to have become terrified at the possible consequences and decided not to go back at all. What foolish ideas got into their childish imaginations and what thoughts terrified them all through the Sabbath evening, no one will ever know. When they were last seen they were trying to put a bold face on the awful intentions they had already conceived, and the girl Wylde laughed as she told a boy friend of hers that she was going to do away with herself in the canal. No one saw them alive after a quarter past 9 o'clock. No one heard of them again until their bodies were taken from the canal next morning.

James Amphlett, a horse driver employed at the East Cannock colliery, stated at the inquest that he had been "keeping company" with Sarah Ward for six months back. On Sunday evening he went to the Salvation Army barracks at Hednesford, with a friend of his named Lloyd, and there saw the two girls. They were outside the barracks then, but later they went in and attended the service, where he afterwards again saw them. At 8 o'clock he saw them again, and they talked together for a while; and then the girls told him how it was that they should have been home at 4, and were now

AFRAID TO RETURN.

They then turned away and began whispering to each other. Amphlett listened, and overheard the girl Ward saying, "We will tie ourselves together;" but at the time he could not understand what they meant. The girls then went down the street towards Hednesford station, and Amphlett went off in an opposite direction altogether. About an hour later Amphlett and Lloyd were returning to their home when they again met the two girls. Lloyd went home and Amphlett remained with the girls for a while, endeavoring to persuade them to go home, but his attempts were fruitless.

"Why won't you go?" he asked.

"Because they will begin reprimanding us," explained the girls.

"Well, what do you mean to do?"

"Make away with ourselves in the canal," answered Elizabeth Wylde, with a laugh, and Amphlett went away thinking the girls were only jesting.

He went and asked his friend Lloyd what he thought of the matter, however; but Lloyd took his view of the case, and said the girls were too sensible for anything wrong to happen them.

And so Amphlett went home and forgot about the girl he had been "keeping company with" for the last six months, and apparently forgot all about her child companion too. And the next morning, when the canal boatmen were dragging their slow boats up the sluggish waterway, they found the two girls slimy and cold and dead, tied together with a red woollen wrapper, and embracing each other as though embraces were felt by the dead.

Another Martyr of the "Christian Science" Humbug.

Mrs. Mary C. Edwards, who has just died in Syracuse, N. Y., was a believer in the Christian Science doctrine, and herself professed to effect cures through the agency of faith. About six weeks ago she went to Utica to treat a patient. While on her way to the cars to return home she fell and broke her hip. She was immediately brought here, and two physicians were called in and reduced the fracture. Then the Christian Scientists took charge of the case, the patient being attended by Mrs. Ellen E. Cross, principal of the Academy of Christian Science in this city, and another disciple of the school. Mrs. Edwards grew worse, and regular physicians were again called, but they could not save her life. They say that their failure was due to the interference of the Christian Science people. The "Scientists" say they could not save the woman's life for the reason that she did not have sufficient faith herself when the crisis came.—Syracuse Cor. New Sun.

MISTRESS OF THE SEAS.

Tremendous Increase Proposed to the British Navy—Fighting Charlie Wants More—The Radicals to Oppose the Increase.

A London cable says: In the House of Commons yesterday Lord George Hamilton, First Lord of the Admiralty, stated that the Government proposed to build eight first-class men of war, of 14,000 tons each, and two of 9,000 tons, nine first-class cruisers, twenty-nine smaller cruisers, four of the Pandora type of cruisers, and eighteen of the sharpshooter type of torpedo vessels. The total tonnage of all these vessels will be 318,000, and the total cost £21,500,000. Lord George asked that £10,000,000 be appropriated from the consolidated fund for the proposed increase of the navy, and that the remainder of the sum required be provided for in the ordinary estimates. He promised that the Admiralty's programme would be executed within four and a-half years. Lord George did not think the proposed increase would induce other nations to attempt to rival England in naval strength, because England had refrained from military rivalry. He did not believe that any other power was capable of executing such an extensive programme in so short a time.

Lord Charles Beresford complained that the Government gave no real reason why just so many ships, no more and no less, should be built. He gave notice of an amendment, declaring that England's naval strength ought to be equal to the navies of France and any other great power combined.

The Radicals will oppose every stage of the legislation connected with Lord George Hamilton's scheme. It is expected Mr. Gladstone will lead the Opposition attack on the Government.

Professor Blackie on the Covenanters.

Emeritus Professor Blackie lectured, the other evening, on the Scottish Covenanters in Dean Free Church, Edinburgh. At the outset he remarked that he did not think the Covenanters got fair play in public estimation; perhaps they got this in Free Church estimation, but he was not a Free Churchman; he was only a lover of all good men. He gave his right hand to the Established Church, his left to the Free, and his heart to both. He did not see much difference between the two denominations, or he should not have been there on that occasion. Proceeding with his address—the period covered dating from 1 60 to 1688—he laid down three propositions: (1) The Scottish nation, as a nation, was essentially Presbyterian; (2) Every distinct people had a right to a national conscience. That was indisputable, let them deny it if they dared. (3) The Church was an ethical association or a spiritual brotherhood, over which the State or secular power had no authority—none at all, and any interference of the State in the administration or regulation of the Church was an act of usurpation and wrong, which justified resistance and repulsion on the part of the offended conscience of the spiritual brotherhood. He afterwards touched briefly on the leading events of the period indicated, eliciting a good deal of laughter by his reference to the famous incident witnessed in St. Giles' on the introduction of the liturgy. He suggested that they should kiss the memorial brass which marked the spot from which the stool was thrown at the Dean, and asked "three cheers" for Jenny Geddes, whom he characterised as the first Covenanter. (Applause).

A Highlander's Adventure.

A person arrayed in full Highland costume caused terrible commotion in a railway carriage in the Perrache station, near Lyons, yesterday. Two ladies who were in the carriage shrieked as they saw the awful spectacle presented by the entry into their compartment of a man without pantaloons. The Highlander, who was on his way to Nice, nevertheless took his seat with Caledonian coolness, whereupon the ladies screamed the louder. It was in vain that the apparition in the garb of old Gaul apologized and explained the situation in bad French, and equally futile were the efforts of the station-master, who assured the ladies that the gentleman with the dirk, the sporran, and the tartan accessories or properties was perfectly harmless. "You don't run the shadow of a risk, Mesdames," insisted the station-master in his blandest tones. "The gentleman comes from a country where the men wear petticoats and do not wear trousers." Despite everything, however, which was said in order to calm their apprehensions, the over-timid lady travellers had to be placed in a carriage at a safe distance from that in which the Caledonian, stern and wild, had taken up his position.—Paris Despatch to the London Daily Telegraph.

"In seventeen hundred and eighty-eight
That was a hundred years ago,
And of "Somebody" what do we know?

"Somebody" once had a place in life,
Prayed her part in its peace and strife,
Had her share in its hopes and fears,
And tasted love with its smiles and tears,
But she careth little, methinks, to-day,

Somebody died—we know not how,
It matters little to Somebody now
If dear ones bent o'er her dying bed,
Or lone and friendless her spirit fled,
Somebody's sleep is calm and still

The sun has shone, and the winds have wailed,
The roses above her glowed and paled,
And the dewdrops glittered like angels' tears,
Night and morn for a hundred years;
And she heeds not question or praise or blame,
And God remembers Somebody's name.

No tell-tale blush shall mount my cheek,
No glance escape my eye,
But with throbbing heart that burns to speak
I'll coldly pass him by.

HE.

I'll pass her by with a careless bow,
She'll surely misconstrue it
And think that I have forgotten how
I loved her once a year ago,
She jilted me when I told her so,
Nor sighed that she must do it,
And again my fate at her feet I'd seek,
But her glance is cold and I shy,
I love her still, but I dare not speak
I'll coldly pass her by.

is a type of thousands of young girls who are emerging from the chrysalis stage of their existence, as they enter upon their "teens." Nervous, excitable, irritable, stirred by strange, unknowable forces within them, each a mystery unto herself, our girls need the tenderest care, the most loving, patient oversight, and the aid of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, to safely carry them through this period, during which too many lives, alas, are sown the seeds of distressing forms of diseases peculiar to the female sex. But this boon to womankind will prevent all such diseases, or cure them if they have already seized a victim. Woman owes it to herself, to her family, and to her social station, to be well and strong. Let her then not neglect the sure means of cure. "Favorite Prescription" is a legitimate medicine, carefully compounded by an experienced and skilful physician, and adapted to woman's delicate organization. It is purely vegetable in its composition and perfectly harmless in its effects in any condition of the system.

THE LADIES' COLUMN.

Women Look Handsome in Fashionable Mirrors.

CURIOSITIES OF THE FASHIONS.

Interesting Notes on the Prospective Spring Styles.

(Cousin Kate's Weekly Budget.)

Remarkable Mirrors.

"It is true," said a dealer in mirrors to a writer in the New York Graphic, "that none of us know exactly what manner of men we are. The mirror does not enable us to see our outer selves as others see us. Only the finest mirrors approach perfection of surface. The best are made of plate glass, but if you happen to look into a large mirror you discover that the straight lines and right angles of a room appear all awry. The reflection most nearly true to the object reflected is obtained perhaps from a hand mirror made of plate glass or from a metallic mirror of moderate size. Great pains are taken to secure a true surface in plate glass, but few mirrors long in use have a surface in a single plane. A slight defect distorts the image. I have seen homely women look almost handsome in a mirror by reason of a defect in the surface that remedied a bad feature. It is not difficult to send such mirrors to ladies who need a flatterer near at hand.

"Here is a mirror that illustrates what I have said," continued the dealer, taking down a circular glass enclosed in a stout frame which was provided with a handle. The listener, looking in, beheld an odd distortion of his own features. One eye appeared higher than the other, one cheek bulged as if swollen with toothache, and the whole countenance was caricatured.

"Look steadily for a minute," said the dealer, and he began to turn the mirror slowly. As he did so the features reflected engaged in a sort of kaleidoscopic dance. For no two seconds was the face the same. While this was going on the eyes of the gazer felt as if they were being twisted out of their sockets and before the mirror had made a full revolution the performance had become very painful.

"Feels odd, doesn't it?" said the dealer. "Now, that mirror is a scientific toy. Its surface is cast purposely in several planes. One eye is reflected in one plane, the other in a different one, and the bulging cheek in still another. The pain to the eyes was caused by the effort to adjust the vision to the constant change of plane presented by the revolution of the mirror."

Fugacious Scissors.

The apparently fugacious habit of scissors have been noticed since the earliest historic period. They disappear with a celerity and secrecy wholly without parallel in the history of lost objects. A woman is sewing and has a pair of scissors in her lap. She uses them, say, twice, and each time drops them in her lap. The third time she wishes to use them she cannot find them. Though she searches her lap, her dress, her hair and the floor thoroughly, she cannot find the slightest trace of the missing scissors, and thereafter they are never again seen by mortal eyes. Or let us say that a woman in the very act of using a pair of scissors is recalled from her work. She places the scissors carefully in her work basket, gets up, locking the door of the room after her. She returns in 10 or 15 minutes to find the scissors gone. What is more remarkable than the disappearance of scissors is that, once having disappeared, they are never again found. You may lose a tack hammer or a comb, but sooner or later you find the missing article behind some piece of furniture, but the pair of scissors once lost is lost forever. There is scarcely a case on record of the final recovery of a pair of scissors that has been missed and has not been found within the next five minutes.

An Eider-Down Evening Wrap.

A pretty and expensive evening wrap is made of eider down. The colors in which this material comes afford a wide range for the fancy, and a light lining of satin, marvellieux, surah or taffeta silk of some contrasting color makes such a sortie de bal gay enough. The ribbons that tie at the throat should be of the color or colors of the eider-down flannel, for this fabric comes sometimes in stripes and figures of contrasting or harmonizing hues.

The Heavy Skirt.

The ladies who declaim against heavy skirts may as well step to the front again. The new fashion posited skirts are from seven to eight yards wide before they are made. That is to say, they will require about ten breadths of single-width material. This is more than would be needed for the ordinary skirt and overdress, concerning which fearful things have been said. London dressmakers prefer kilt plaits, artfully gored at the top, and so made that only twice the width of the skirt lining is needed for them.

Early Spring Styles.

Soft gray and shell pink will be a favorite combination for spring toilets.

Spring mixtures are handsomely made in combinations of black and steel gray.

Among new ball dress fabrics are to be seen ribbon striped nets and gazes.

Bonnet pins are larger than formerly and show many patterns of which many are floral in design.

Novel hues in strawberry, old rose, raspberry, mahogany red and rosewood are promised for the spring.

Lenten toilets are strictly plain and ecclesiastical, but very beautiful ones are to be seen in the modestest shops.

Gold or brown will be the ladies' hair color for the coming season. A rather stylish hue is golden brown with a strong tinge of red.

Jackets of black velvet will be worn in maroon leather with white beads, white kid with black beads. They are very smart in all cases.

For second mourning silver-shot black silks are novel and quite effective. They will be trimmed with jet and silver galloons or cut-steel passementerie.

Parisian women carry the expensiveness and elegance of their underclothing to excess. Over chemises of cambric and valenciennes lace are worn corsets of satin —black or red for daytime, white, cream or pale pink for evening. Under petticoats match the corsets and are trimmed with lace.

Experiments Work for Farmers.

The m[illegible] of the Experimental Union are [illegible]ng to introduce a system of practical [illegible] experiments, in which they solicit the co[illegible]operation of the farming community. The object is to inaugurate such experimental work as will be valuable to every farmer in the Province. These experiments are intended to be such as can be carried out by almost every farmer, with but little trouble or expense. The following are the experiments chosen for this year, and the systems for carrying them out:

1. A continuation of the experiments of 1888 on the same plots, without further application of fertilizers.

2. A test of superphosphate, dried blood, farmyard manure, and no manure with oats.

3. A comparison of the different systems of raising fodder corn.

The first is only to be undertaken by those who experimented with fertilizers in 1888; the second is to ascertain the value of some of our quick acting and best known fertilizers. This experiment will prove especially valuable to small farms, grain and truck farms. The third, the shortage of pasture and increased use of supplemental crops impresses upon us the need of the best methods of raising fodder for summer and winter use. With this object in view the experiment with corn was planned.

Other experiments are being arranged in stock feeding, dairying, horticulture and bee keeping by different institutes.

We expect the help of farmers in this work, and would look them to apply to Mr. C. A. Zavitz, Secretary of the experiments, O. A. C., Guelph, for further information. Our means being limited, those who apply first will be supplied with experimental material. The result of the work should well repay each one who takes part in it.

When a felon first begins to make its appearance take a lemon, cut off one end, put the finger in, and the longer it is kept there the better.

For a cold in the chest, a flannel rag wrung out in boiling water and sprinkled with turpentine laid on the chest, gives the greatest relief.

The best treatment in regard to offensive breath is the use of powdered charcoal, two or three tablespoonfuls per week, taken in a glass of water before retiring for the night.

For a cough boil one ounce of flax seed in a pint of water, strain and add a little honey, one ounce of rock candy and the juice of three lemons; mix and boil well. Drink as hot as possible.

Often after cooking a meal a person will feel tired and have no appetite. For this beat a raw egg until light, stir in a little milk and sugar and season with nutmeg. Drink half an hour before eating.

For a burn or scald make a paste common baking soda and water, apply at once and cover with a linen cloth. When the skin is broken apply the white of an egg with a feather; this gives instant relief, as it keeps the air from the flesh.

Cause Enough.

De Bigsey—What makes you so down in the mouth, Rigley?

Rigley (with a long drawn sigh)—Addition to my family last night.

De Bigsey—Then why the deuce are you so glum? Was it a boy or girl?

Rigley—Neither. Miss Recusant became my sister.

She Was Engaged.

Mrs. Wiseacre—And so you are engaged to Clara Vere de Vere? She is so haughty and cold and beautiful I did not suppose any one could ever get engaged to her. How did you manage it?

Adult Son—I didn't. She managed it.

Ego.

De Boorem—Where is my father? Oh, he is off to the cattle show. I never see much of him. His main hobby in life is fat pigs.

Miss Prettypert—I wonder he doesn't take more interest in you.

REALISM IN PICTURE FRAMES.

The Carver Called In to Aid Painter and Etcher.

Art in picture frames is getting very realistic, according to the London Star. Frames are almost as clever as the pictures. An etching of "Angelus," for instance, is framed in a broad band of chestnut, shaded in dusky tints, with an old bell from which hangs a coil of rope carved on one side and a flight of bats spreading their wings on the other. Another etching of a harvest field is framed in chestnut with a scythe and rake in dull silver on the top edge. A panel of Landseer's dogs, framed in oak for the hall, has a realistic whip trailing across the top of the wood; a silver chain and padlock is fastened from corner to corner below. An etching of a laughing girl with her head on a pillow is not marred at all by the frame; the wood is enamelled, picked out in silver and gold, and made a continuation of the lace cushion upon which the girl's head is resting. Carved and enamelled frames are putting ponderous gilt borders out, of course. Enamelling is done in white and gold, pale blue and pink, to suit Pompadour rooms. A water color marine view has an enamelled frame in whitish green tints, suggesting sea foam. Across one corner is stretched a piece of net, and in the net struggles a fish with iridescent scales. Other marine pictures have cable cord stretched about the frames, or oars, harpoons and anchors applied in dull silver. The carved frames are more elaborate. The carving is done in intaglio and is sometimes darkened, giving the effect almost of a burned-wood sketch done on the frame. A genre picture of a frog concert has a tracery of carving on its wide, flat frame, showing water weeds, lily-pods and notes of the batrachian music. Harvesters at work in the field have carved frames showing heads of grain. But the most radical of all steps is taken when the carved frame not only echoes but actually continues the picture. This is most easily possible with the yellow brown tones of a photogravure. A landscape scene shows you a farm house in the distance, a country lane, a ploughed field. The lane runs directly toward you, projects on the frame, and is carved without a break. The furrows of the turned ground do the same. The farm house itself encroaches on the wood, and the fence at its side and the trees which overhang it are wholly carved. So with an old boat which a peasant woman is puling. The bow is photogravure, the stern is carving. The waves are half of them carved. The woman's right oar begins in the picture, but its blade is carved in the frame.

Burlington's Romance.

Early in the present century Burlington's admirable location attracted the attention of the pioneer settlers, and the settlement of the country extended out from Burlington, or Wellington Square as it was first called. This name was given to it by Capt. Joseph Brant, Chief of the Six Nation Indians, on account, it is said, of his admiration of the Duke of Wellington. The site of the village occupies a portion of the old Brant Block of 400 acres, being Indian reserve land. Close to the village is the Brant House, now used as an hotel, and which has since been enlarged and improved. Around this building the memories of a tragedy exists, in which the warrior chieftain was the principal actor. A son of Brant's, who was a desperate character, resolved that he would have the old man's scalp, actuated, so the story goes, by the desire for the chieftainship. Hoping the son would desist from his murderous attempt Brant secreted himself in one of the rooms. This having no effect the bold chief threw open the door and ordered the crowd to offer no further resistance, when the would-be murderer rushed into the room and was instantly shot down by the aged chief. After the sale of this Indian reserve land, the remains of the chieftain were taken to the Mohawk cemetery near Brantford and buried.—Toronto World.

Curious Things in Life.

There is a type of man who doesn't care for a bright woman, or a pregnant one, and whose ideal is something between an Alderney and a Holstein cow.—Philadelphia Times.

An Ohio farmer mortgaged his farm to get his wife some diamond ear rings, and she lost one of them in the suds the very first wash day and attempted to hang herself in the barn.

A fellow in Chester, Pa., has found out why a dog sometimes turns around three times before he lies down for a snooze. The reason is: A dog thinks one good turn deserves another.

The gilded rooster on the tower of the First National Bank building at Portland, Me., is the same bird that served as a weather vane on the top of the old Portland Court House over 100 years ago.

Max O'Rell has received a bona fide offer of $25,000 and a special car, together with expenses for himself and family, to make a lecture tour in America. He writes to Major Pond that he does not think much of the idea of being made a circus of, even in America.

Judas Abolished.

Judas has been officially abolished in the Island of Madeira. It has been a time-honored custom of the natives to exhibit in one of their numerous religious processions an effigy of Judas, upon which the opprobrium of the populace was duly heaped, and at the close of the day Judas was burned with vociferous expressions of triumph and joy. Of late years it has happened that the effigy of Judas has borne a striking resemblance to some person upon whom the general public has ceased to smile, and thus the Governor of the Island, the Mayor of Funchal and a foreign consul have been caricatured in the processions and burned in effigy. The powers that be have decided that the admixture of politics and religion is not wholesome, and so the edict has gone forth that hereafter the people must get along without Judas.—New York Sun.

Captain Gilkin, one of the oldest residents of Brockville, is dead. He was on the Sir Robert Peel at the time that vessel was captured and burned by the rebels at Wells' Island in the autumn of 1838, and, so far as known, with his death the last person of those who were eye witnesses of that memorable event is removed. The captain was a boy about 16 years of age at that time.

IN KNICKERBOCKERS.

An Innovation in Evening Dress Introduced by Young Society Men.

The dance that was given on Monday night by Mr. and Mrs. William Douglass Sloane at 642 Fifth avenue in honor of the debut of Miss Louise Shepard, daughter of Col. Elliott F. Shepard, was marked by a picturesque and interesting social innovation in costume worn by a group of seven young society men, who have recently formed themselves into a club, and who propose hereafter to discard the regulation evening dress at receptions or balls. The leader of this club is Broker John C. Furman, who is connected with Waterbury & Co., of 132 Front street. His associates are Messrs. Thomas Howard, Robert Hargous, James Waterbury, Worthington Whitehouse, Edward C. Potter and Broker S. S. Sands, jun. They arrived on Monday night after the drawing room was filled with guests, and sauntered in, dressed all alike in knee breeches and tailless dress coats. Their arrival made an instant sensation, and the debutante and the belles who were clustered about her studied the novel attire with admiration. The knee breeches of each of the seven swells were of rich black satin, fastened at the knee with silver buckles. Black silk stockings encased the calves, and the dancing pumps were made after the fashion of the old Knickerbocker shoe and fastened with buckles of burnished silver. The dress coats were of black velvet, cut somewhat after the type of shooting jackets, and worn over low cut waistcoats of black watered silk, such as are worn with the ordinary dress coat of the present season. Each man wore a linen dress shirt, with plain bosom and standing collar, encircled with a plain white tie.—New York Sun.

The Wants of a Family.

By Kate Thorn.

The man who has a family of children seldom gets a night's rest. It is one of the conditions of that blessed estate.

He retires early because the children must not be disturbed by his coming up late. That is good. No fault can be found with that. His wife is tired, as she has an undoubted right to be.

She toasts her feet by the fire, does her front hair up on rimping machinery, puts some glycerine on her hands, makes sure that the chamber door is locked and bolted, and a chair with the lamp and some matches in it set against it, and then she gets into bed, and says she knows she shan't sleep a wink to-night. She feels just like it.

The family man lies over with his face to the wall, and is just setting into his "beauty sleep," when the piping voice of his little son calls out from the bed in the adjoining chamber, the door of which is always left open.

"Pa! I want some water. I say pa! I'm a-dry!"

The family man ignores the cry, hoping that the child will fall asleep without enforcing his demand, and he gives utterance to a vigorous snore, which all family men learn to practice, and his wife gives him a jog with her well trained elbow.

"Thomas, don't you hear Gene cry? He is thirsty, Thomas. How can you lie there and snore, and that blessed child choking to death for want of a little water?"

Another more pronounced snore.

"Pa!" this time the little voice has become hoarse, and the notes are more in a minor octave. "I want some water. Say, pa! I want some water."

"Thomas" (gives the living member near a vicious reproach and vigorous kick), "Eugene is crying for some water."

"It's too cold to get up," growls the family man, thinking of just how cold and slippery that strip of oil cloth in the outer hall will feel to his feet, and how unconsciously he will run down his spine when he goes through the dining room to the kitchen pump.

"I want it now!" cries the child—real cold! Just pumped!"

The family man gets out of bed and feels for the mat there.

"Take care, Thomas, cross here softly, or you'll upset the lamp! The matches are right there under your nose. Strange that a man never can find anything! I knew I should have to get up. Now, mind you lock the kitchen door again after you, and while you are down there just see if the front door is bolted. I have forgotten whether I looked at it when I came to bed."

Thomas unbolts and unlocks the chamber door, and proceeds downstairs, and returns with the water, and by that time the boy is asleep, and his ma thinks he had better not be awakened.

The door is secured, the light out, and then the wife nudges her husband.

"My throat feels a little sore, Thomas. I wish you would go down and bring up the camphor before you go to sleep."

"Put on some bay rum" suggests the family man.

"Bay rum, indeed!" cries the wife. "Why, who ever heard of bay rum for a sore throat! When I am dead, Thomas, you will think of this, and I a good and faithful wife to you, and the mother of your children!"

The family man gets out of bed again, and makes another expedition downstairs, and brings up a bottle of ammonia by mistake and has to return; and by the time he gets back the boy who wanted water is awake again, and this time he wants milk, and he refuses to have anything else, and the little girl in the cribrouses up and cries for a drink, and declines to take the water brought up for her brother because it tastes hot; and so the family man has to descend again and unlock and lock all these doors.

Is it any wonder that suicide is on the increase?

MANNERS AND SUCCESS.

Everybody Is Against People Who Are Disagreeable.

Lord Palmerston once said to a friend of mine, who, as a young fellow was patronized by that statesman: "Never forget that a much neglected road to success is agreeable manners. The man or woman with agreeable manners will make headway in the face of the worst difficulties. Every one is against the disagreeable people, whose best chance lies in secluding themselves as much as they can." Emperor William might ponder with advantage on these words of Pam. Not having secluded himself but gone to Vienna and Rome, the allies of his grandfather there would gladly slip from their alliance with him. The old Emperor and the Emperor Frederick bore their great positions with simplicity and sweetness. William II. hears with impatience all opinions that do not match with his own, and is arrogant in putting them down. He has made the Emperor Franz Joseph bristle up. The Italians were unfavorably impressed by him. From whom did he take his bad manners? His father was a nice, good fellow and so knightly! The old grandfather was courtesy itself. The Empress Frederick is not insolent or haughty, neither is Augusta, who attaches but small importance to her imperial rank, and whose ideal of life is intellectual and ladylike Bohemianism. My theory to explain the bad form of William II. is that he has too much Saxe Coburg blood in his veins. The Queen's manners, when she is in good humor, are pleasant. But when she is not—well, I don't venture to say how she struck me on a public occasion on which I saw her in a sullen mood. I cannot conceive how any one could have ever liked the Prince Consort. There was so much ice in his demeanor. The Duke of Edinburgh and his uncle, Ernest, are both surly. Old King Leopold inspired repugnance to all but Saxe Coburgs and Baron Stockmar. The Duchess of Kent was the best Saxe Coburg that ever lived, and the most agreeable, she being free from affectation, and throughout life a good soul, though in some respects a masterful woman.—London Truth.

Eli Perkins on Modern Music.

When Eugene Augustus asked her to sing last night she stirred up her long train, prettily wiggle waggled to the piano, and sang

The Best Exercise for Children.

Instinctive gymnastics is, from the hygienic point of view, the best adapted to the regular development of the child. It is not liable to any of the objections we have brought against gymnastics with apparatus. It does not deform the body, for it is made up of spontaneous movements and confined to the natural exercise of each limb. It does not locate the work in a particular region of the body, for all the limbs are put actively in motion, to take their quota of exercise, and it does not seduce the child into its touching upon the limits of his strength. But not also invites him to the kind of work which is best adapted to his particular aptitudes for resisting fatigue. He has a natural disposition to perform right but frequently recurring acts, [illegible] motions, which put him out of breath, while exercise with apparatus rather exacts slow and intense efforts that bring on local fatigue. Now all observers have noticed the wonderful facility with which a child recovers its breath and its capabilities of local fatigue. Finally, natural exercise, being the satisfaction of a want, is by that very fact a pleasure, and overshines in the face of the child who is playing freely.—Les Exercises Libres, Young Children, All Human Exercises, the Popular Sense, Curiosity for Knowledge.

We congratulate the Advertiser and Mr. Clark.

Friend Fawcett has occasion to remark that "as a class the Artemesia farmers are a remarkably honorable and straightforward lot of men. We venture to say that, in these respects, they would put to shame the agriculturists in many of the frontier townships." All of which The Advance heartily endorses. But we would just remark that this is no back-country township like it was a few years ago, "and don't you forget it." The 'frontier' townships are no better in any respect unless it be the quality of soil.

Bro Thurston should go to the rescue of his friend." Not necessarily. But then, of course, as the Mirror never experienced the sensation it cannot be expected to understand that no man ever makes much of a furore in this world unless he keeps his muscles continually on the "strain" and his teeth "clenched."

A Narrow Escape.

The tannery of Mr C.C. James, at Priceville, had a narrow escape from being burned down the other day. The roof took fire, and a large hole was made in it before the blaze was extinguished.

Mr. Enes the Man.

At a joint meeting of members of the Presbyterian charge in Markdale and Flesherton last week it was unanimously resolved to tender a call to Rev Mr. Enes, who has preached in these churches on three different occasions. An Evening of Song.

The large number of people who attended the concert and tea on Friday evening were in no wise disappointed. They went to hear music and they heard it. Leard home talent of a more than medi[illegible] order, and foreign talent that ranged [illegible] endowed with the rare gift of a powerful voice, of wonderful range, sweetness, and power. Mrs Shilton of Toronto, possesses a remarkable voice in many respects. It is a rich, ringing contralto, of great power, and under perfect control. It exhibits the perfection of long training and studious care. There was a certain disadvantage under which the lady sang. In a large hall with better acoustics her voice would be heard to more advantage. The choice of our church in this respect never favored themselves to us before, but the grand voice was thrown back upon itself in a degree, and a sense of confinement attended its utterance. A voice of Mrs Shiltons calibre would most certainly improve by more freedom in a more spacious auditorium. Her first selection was "The Pilgrim," by Adams; for the most electrifying piece which she rendered was Dudley Buck's "Concone." This is a rather difficult selection, and displayed Mrs. Shilton's voice to perfection, her power of expression and the ease with which she can soar from high to low with absolutely no quiver. Her encore "Thro' the Rye," "Annie Laurie" and "Killarney" were also heartily received as encores, in which respect Mrs. Shilton cheerfully submitted several times to demands of the audience.

The other musical portion of the program consisted of an anthem by the choir, a solo sung by Miss Christoe in her inimitable style entitled "The Old Folks," a quartet by the Misses. Richardson and Messrs. Russell and Richardson, a duet by the Misses Richardson, a solo by Miss Vandusen, a duet by Mrs. Blackburn and Miss Christoe, and several selections by the Glee Club, all of which were rendered very creditably indeed, and all went to make up an evening of music such as is seldom enjoyed by our music-loving citizens.

Refreshments were served in the basement of the church.

For the benefit of the curious we might say that Mrs. Shilton is sister-in-law of our popular minister, Rev. J. W. Shilton, and resides in Parkdale, her husband being a solicitor there. It is not probable that this will be the last occasion which the people of Flesherton will have of enjoying her singing.

Flesherton Station

Gleaned by our own Reporter.

The community around here are somewhat taken by surprise at so early an appearance of spring and the roads breaking up so soon, as a goodly number have not completed their winter's work, nevertheless looking over the station yard you would come to the conclusion that the station has been a live place this winter so far as the amount of material delivered is concerned, to say nothing of grain.

As the winter season is about over and the near spring approaching and the time of the singing of the birds has come, Mr. Whittaker contemplates removing to his summer residence shortly so that he may have a fair view of the station and its surroundings. That's right friend John.

Mr. McGinnis is just getting things into shape as he is determined to run a first class hotel. It takes a live man to do a live business. Don't you forget it Mc.

Friend Crossley has taken the cake this winter for the business he has done in the livery line. Put on more rigs, young man, and take no second best.

There is another young man on the back line who has been masked and led captive by that fair one from Creemore. She started for home last Friday, but only got a half a mile or so when she met this second young man, who persuaded her to stay a day or so longer. She stayed! The same day they took a drive to Priceville, and on Sunday "she" departed for home. The young men around here are now singing, "With all thy faults I love thee still," and "Good bye, Sweetheart."

Wood bees and so on have been the rage for the past ten days around here. But the more noticeable was Mr. Thos. McArthur's. After his along sickness he thought he would invite a large concourse of his friends to join with him and have a good time in the way of dancing and other games. And so they had. They were supplied with music by the boy fiddler.

Last but not least, was that of Mr. Wm. Wright's wood bee; it was not that success as far as the amount of wood cut is concerned, for the amount of men there was attea. There was a bountiffull spread of the good things of this life, and each and all did ample justice to the viand's set before them. Tea being over, things were put in shape for an [illegible] to the tune of a good hoe down, and a hoe down it was, as they were determined not to go home until morning, and morning it was.

The grist mill is again in full blast. Mr. Ferguson, of Cheltenham has taken charge. He comes well recommended and appears to be a thorough business man, so that during the coming summer we hope to hear the pleasing music of the merry millstones. We wish Mr. Ferguson success in his undertaking.

Messrs. W. Williams and F. Carr are employed in Mr. Hazard's saw mill, Preston Station.

A goodly number of farmers took advantage of the last two weeks of sleighing and drew in a large number of sawlogs. Now the sleighing is done and the wheels have already begun to rattle over the stony streets. The river is rapidly loosing its fetters of ice and the falls present a glittering aspect.

The sap buckets have already been got out and scalded, and the path has been made to the woods, so the sugar campaign has almost begun.

Kimberley.

From our own Correspondent.

The Rev. Mr. Watts is still carrying on special services in this place with good results. Many are being turned from darkness into light and from the power of Satan unto God, and we hope to see many more turn from their evil ways and and give their heart to Jesus.

Mr. R. Baker left this week for Owen Sound where he intends to reside for some time, and Mr. D. Wallace is again in our midst.

The sleighing is all gone in this place and the roads are drying up like the would in the month of May.

A few of the young people from Kimberley went to Epping on Thursday night last to assist in a concert which was got up under the able management of Miss M. Gilray and Miss S. J. McConnell. Proceeds in aid of an old couple living in that vicinity who have no means to live only what is given to them. The concert was grand so says one who was there. The Marshall family was present and sang some very fine selections. The Marshall family are very beautiful singers and are willing to help in a good cause whenever they can. Mr. Burns, of the firm of Long & Bros. Thornbury, sang some of his comic songs. As an Irish comic Mr. Burns is second to none in this part of the country. Any one who would like to see his smiling countenance can do so by calling at Long & Bros. store and he will be glad to wait your pleasure. Mr. J. Richards, of Rocklyn, gave a couple of his comic recitations. Mr. R. Gilray, sr., occupied the chair in his usual pleasing manner. The young people who assisted in the concert from this place say they could not have been used better. They say the people of Epping are a whole-hearted people, and that they will be pleased to assist the Epping people at some future time if in their power.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Manitoba.

By our own Correspondent.

Mr. Editor,—March "came in as gentle as a lamb" with the "wool drawn over its eyes"—the early morning being dark, and foggy, but calm, and mild. By eight o'clock the fog "lifted,"

When brightly shone the king of day,
And westward journeyed on his way.

No great credit is due the "month of many weathers" for his "gentle" appearance this time because his predecessors during the previous week had set an example of calm, spring-like weather. Fires for warming are not required now in rooms having a "Southern exposure." But this is not usually the case here, and probably before the "grass grows" weeks of wintry weather will occur, yet I like Manitoba.

I will now try to impart a few items of information to your readers concerning

Things which have never "seen the light,"
Things to be seen as "twice by night,"
Things sometimes seen at "darkness' flight,"
Things plainly seen at noon day bright.

Inhabitants of Ontario, and further east know what it is to "see ones breath" on extremely cold days, but in this dry atmosphere, on a clear, cold day, the sun shining, (as is commonly the case here,) the amount of "breath," or vapor, appears to be tenfold more, and "plainer seen" than in eastern provinces. "You'd ought" to see men, women, and children, on the street, walking along emitting "puffs" from their nostrils similar to a small steam engine and they can't help it "you see." Of course, horses, cattle, and dogs, "puff" out the steam," or vapor also. And just here and elsewhere, let me inform you that dogs are more generally used as teams in Manitoba, and the territories, than you "ever dreamed of," especially in towns and cities. Harnessed to a sleigh, toboggan, cart, or arriage, they "scoot along" drawing a boy, (sometimes a man) delivering milk, parcels of goods, etc., to customers. One dog will draw a "big lump of a boy" with the speed of a horse, sometimes a little too fast, if he sees another dog which he has a "grudge at" he will rush forward and perhaps upset the boy and all,

LOTS OF ONTARIO

INTO THE GUTTER,

if the one rope or rein is not instantly tightened. I need not say into the snow, because so little feel here that the novelty of an "upset into a snow bank" is seldom enjoyed! However, the dogs are very good natured, and a "dog fight" rarely occurs, and during nearly three years' residence in the city of

"TWENTY THOUSAND DOGS,

(I've been told there is this number, probably not correct,) I have not heard of one going mad! The level surface of a prairie country is more suitable for dog teams, than uneven and where hills abound, therefore I would not advise men or boys of such countries to train dogs for drawing, use them for watch dogs etc., where necessary, but in my opinion the fewer dogs in any country the better. I presume it is not known in the older provinces what kind of firewood is used here, therefore I will now talk to those more immediately concerned.

"THE FEMALE DEPARTMENT."

We have poplar, tamarack, oak, pine, (Norway cedar, spruce, birch, etc. Not a very great variety. While living in Ontario we burned upwards of twenty kinds, and while in North Carolina, eight or ten varieties, viz., oak, oak-chestnut, pine, pitch pine, gum trees, etc. But for easy cutting, (women sometimes have to cut firewood, "more's the shame to men, and boys,) light handling, and quick fires, poplar wood is superior to all, little or no "kindling wood" being required, just put in the wood, apply a match, and you have a fire soon! But it must be seasoned. You may as well try to get a fire from green basswood, with wet shavings for kindling, as to think of making unseasoned poplar burn; it won't try to, it knows better (?) "you know." When there are but a few live coals, (the wood all burnt) lay one or more sticks on and almost instantly it is ablaze.

FUR OVERCOATS, ETC.

In a former letter I mentioned this kind of clothing, so common in the country. Lest some one be under the impression that, like dwelling in Arctic regions, we have but little daylight during the winter season, permit me to say, this is not the case; even now the days are longer than in Ontario, "by the Almanack," and

"Sunshine, and roses
To gladden our way."

"Rosy cheeks" understand me, please However, "furs and wraps" are indispensable for about three months, and there's "no use denying it." And as for "sunshine," no fail, however cold the weather is, of sunshine almost every day, in fact the sun shines here in cloudy weather!

A STOVE IN A SLEIGH.

Of one more 'thing which has never seen the light," (I presume in Ontario, either by press, pencil, or pen,) I will now "bring to light." Fruit and vegetable dealers convey such on extremely cold days throughout the city in "little log cabin" frame, on a sleigh, a "Lilliputian" stove therein, the pipes protruding through the roof "smoking away," not by "puffs" as does the "breath" (previously mentioned,) from the nasal organs of persons on the street, but it's a novel sight "all the same." Probably in my next I will tell you of some people in this country who have

RED EYES,

"Calico" horses, birds that walk ropes without being trained, also news items of more importance.

WM. PURDY.

Winnipeg, March 2nd 1889

Addenda.—Until the 5th Feb., the winter was unusually mild. Since then up to the 25th a "cold wave" has been "waving" back and forth from north to south, and from south to north every twenty-four hours, (sometimes less,) not remaining long enough southward to get "warmed up," as "old M——" said when he swallowed the tobacco juice. During my residence here I never before knew the wind to change [illegible] short intervals. After the 25th [illegible] weather became [illegible] thing, [illegible] cate an early [illegible]

Balsam Valley Items.

From our own Correspondent.

The entertainment at Hillside Academy, which took place last Wednesday night, was a grand success, the weather being very favorable, there was a very large turnout, which you will see by the money received, $21 25. School children and all who took a part in the program got in free. At 7:30 the chair was taken by Mr. Sam. Kinnel, who called the meeting to order by announcing that Mr. Rutherford, ventriloquist, from Dundalk, was going to sing a song which he did sing and act to perfection. The curtain was drawn amid roars of laughter, mingled with deafening shouts of encore. The program consisted of readings, songs, recitations, dialogues, dancing, and music from the band, which consisted of the Parks Bros. with their violin and clarionet, S. Kinnel and organ, and J. Haw with and his picolo. One of the best features in in the evening's proceedings was the excellent dancing performed by John H. Campbell and his little sister dancing the Highland fling, sword dance, sailor's hornpipe and Irish jig. Mr. Rutherford amused the children very much by holding a mixed conversation with his dolls, as he termed them, also by telling his experience in the farm. He also sang some comic songs. Several others also sang some very nice songs. The children's program indeed a good one, and much praise is due Mr. W. J. Bateson, who trained them.

Mr. W. Frook had a wood bee some time ago. He got quite a lot of wood cut. The boys thought it a good place to try themselves and saws, so they got two trees felled in pretty good position, and L. Frook and P. Ferguson chose an old Lance saw with teeth about ½ of an inch long, and J. Ferguson and W. Frook took a Star saw. Their intention before starting was to beat any sawing that was ever done in the country, and they succeeded. The South Line boys at A. McMillan's cut a cord in 20 minutes and wanted somebody to ditto. Well those fellows ditched, but they should not blow until beat the record. The Brownsville boys cut a cord in 17 minutes about a year ago, and those whose names appear here cut 1½ in 9 minutes and 30 seconds. This is each saw cut ¾ of a cord in 9½ minutes. I understand they are very wroth about the challenge J. Ferguson sent to the Advance. They don't seem to appreciate it at all, as it has the same effect on them as a damper has on a stove, it stops the draft.

Mr. Adam Watson has left for parts unknown. The saw mill he owned here will be in running order pretty soon. It will be run in future by Adam Watson, cousin of the former owner.

Mr. John McLean is laid up with sore throat, but under the good treatment of Dr. Hutton, of Priceville, we hope he will soon recover.

Mr. Pat Sullivan is also very ill. We trust he will be around soon.

Mr. H. Lamont is working for Mr. Holmes again. He got his pay all right.

Mr. A. Nevin is looked upon as an old married man. He is not rushing the girls now, but logs and ties. OBEN.

Neddy.

There once was a small dog called Neddy,
Who slept in the street 'neath a stall,
His food was whatever he picked up
And often he had none at all;
But he never was sad or unhappy,
And he had the most comical way
Of looking on pet dogs with pity
When led by a string round to play.

Rough Neddy, though homeless, was happy
As happy as small dog could be,
For friends often he wanted a dinner
He had all the delights of the free.
Two friends as Neddy had he loved dearly—
One a sweet little girl in the street,
The other a great big policeman
That he oft followed round on his beat.

Why he liked the policeman I know not,
Perhaps 'cos he felt safe 'neath his club,
But the dear little girl often fed him
And to her he gave all his love.
He would watch near her house till he saw her,
When she came out his heart gave deep throbs,
And [illegible] he would stray, though the bad boys
Would beat him, and throw at him stones.

When she came out, then Neddy was happy,
At her feet he would lie with [illegible]
Looking up in her face, running round her
Barking and wagging his tail.
One day as Greedy I played quite near him
My quicker than I can it tell,
Neddy, the feet of a horse rushing by her
Bore off and wounded she fell.

Men carried her [illegible] while poor Neddy
Was broke [illegible] tried to...
But he would not go off, though they beat him,
For he knew she lay suffering within.
Every night the policeman there found him,
Lying whining across her front door,
And [illegible] him, tried to console him,
Neddy's cries were as loud as before.

One night he stole in through the basement,
Slipped in past the maid's blow and broom
Then he ran thro' the house till he found her
And to see her entered her room.
Neddy jumped on a chair to look over
The [illegible] dear face in the bed,
He [illegible] knew it

ESTELLE'S INFATUATION:

A NOVEL.

Hidden in the wood from all eyes but those of the Great Mother, poor Estelle was breaking her heart, yet doing her best not to be too selfish in her sorrow. It was for Charlie's good in every way that he should have this splendid commission; and she knew as well as he that it was for her good too in the end. Were not their lives essentially one, although to all appearance as yet divided? Still, the moment was bitter, and Estelle was not ashamed to suffer. Those two young creatures in the wood went through the old familiar tragedy; and then the moment came when they must absolutely part—his face turned to the mighty world of London, where he should find the grand anodyne of work and the noble stimulus of active endeavor; she to the restricted life of home, where her mother would not be her friend, and her father might not. But so it is. The weak one is ever singled to "endure what it once possessed"; and while the men dare and die, the women live and weep.

Spring and summer, and even autumn itself, had fled now for Estelle. It was the winter of her soul, the winter of her discontent, which yet had in it something divine. Her lover was away, and the sun had gone out of her sky. She gave up society and found the visitings parties the very haunts of dulness and the homes of ennui. She suddenly became miserly of time, and her diligence at home was really edifying to the whole household. Mrs. Clanricarde was far too clever to spoil the whole brew for want of a little sugar. She looked narrowly after the post, and let her daughter receive all Charlie's letters uninterrupted, knowing that to have prevented their free delivery would have simply created an under-hand post office, where she would have had no supervision. What she would do in the future was another matter altogether. Meanwhile Charlie Osborne found his place in London one after his own heart. The Smythe Smiths were charming people—for parvenus. Of course they were pretentious. That is the very essence of the condition. For being afraid to show ignorance, and not knowing into what circles of knowledge high bred people are in a manner born the parvenu assumes to know everything, and makes bad shots in consequence. But they were substantially sensible people, and amenable. To yield apparently was in reality to direct, as Charlie soon found out, and safely acted on. When Mrs. Smythe Smith made her suggestions, which were blemishes, and Mr. Smythe Smith made his, which were suicidal, the young artist accepted them as though they were absolutely worth considering. He began by praising them en bloc, and ended by deftly whittling them away to nothing. But he had the renunciation come from them as their own spontaneous decision, and saved their self love, his own credit, and the harmony of his ideas unbroken. Then they were generous people and spared no expense in any direction. And next to the pleasure of spending their own money is that of manipulating other people's, a pleasure of which Charlie was keenly conscious, and by no means shy in its use. Mrs. Smythe Smith, too, a showy, well-preserved woman on the right side of forty, had taken an immense fancy for this handsome artist, guest, and friend. She called herself his mother, and treated him with as much affection as she treated her own son, Lawrence—a tall, well built young athlete of twenty, who looked more like her younger brother than her son. She petted him greatly, and made much of him in all ways. Not Estelle herself touched that irritable self love of his with a softer hand than did this wealthy parvenue, whom Charlie himself was not ashamed to own as his patroness.

On his side Mr. Smythe Smith was just as kind, just as satisfactory.

To do Charlie justice, nothing of all this touched his fidelity to Estelle. He never forgot her, and wrote to her at the first frantically and frequently; as time went on with the most lovely and consoling regularity, but not so often, and with less of the poison of despair and more of the honey of hope in his letters. This voluntary confidence and strict association made her very happy so far as a girl separated for an indefinite time from the man she passionately loves, and with whom her engagement is in secret and against her mother's permission, can be said to be happy in any sense.

So time passed, and the autumn and the winter flowed once more into the spring, and still things were exactly where they were. The grand house in Piccadilly was [illegible] almost finished, and the Smythe [illegible]ld soon move into it. Charlie had made a good "hatful" of money, as he phrased it, and he had been careful—for a young artist—and not extravagant. But a thunder bolt fell out of the blue; and a cloud at first no bigger than a man's hand soon swept over the whole sunny south. Charlie's health, which had long given Mrs Smythe Smith uneasiness, though he himself made light of her fears, suddenly gave way with a run, and a broken blood-vessel brought him to the brink of the grave and kept him there for some time.

As no one knew of his engagement to Estelle Clanricarde, there was no one to write and tell her what had happened, nor what was the reason of this sudden cessation of letters. The poor girl fretted herself ill in sympathy with her absent lover, feeling sure that it was illness with him, and in no wise treachery nor desertion. At her instance Lady Elizabeth took it on herself to write to Mrs. Smythe Smith, making general inquiries as to the work, and whether they were not pleased with their artist, and when would it be finished, etc., etc. All meaning the one simple little question, "Why has not Charlie Osborne written for so long to Estelle Clanricarde?"

Then Mrs. Smythe Smith answered, and the sorrowful truth came out. As soon as he was able to bear it they were going to put him on board their steam yacht and send him round the world with their son.

There was no help for it. Nor tears nor prayers can stay the tide, put back the hand of time, nor make that broken blood-vessel as good as new without absence, care, and long delay. As things were, it was a merciful ordering of Providence that Charlie had such good friends—people both able and willing to help him in his day of need.

So Lady Elizabeth argued, doing her best to comfort poor Estelle, who, unselfish and unexacting as she might be, yet felt as if this voyage were the doom of her eternal separation, and that she would nevermore see her beloved. Hope lay dead at her feet, and happiness was but a broken bubble. Her life was widowed; her soul was sunk into eternal mourning. Henceforth she had only memory and her own eternal faith. For she would die as she was now devoted to Charlie and to Charlie only.

Charlie going away for perhaps a year, perhaps two ill, unseen, unkissed, bearing with him only her heart and all her joy what solace could she have? Not even her mother's increased tenderness made amends for this supreme loss, and so the blackness came, and what had been only the twilight of hope unfulfilled was now the midnight of despair, and a darkness which no star melted, and not even a meteor illumined.

BOOK SECOND.

CHAPTER I

THE NEW TIES.

In the country where they lived, the Harfords had that character for eccentricity which belongs to all people of originality of thought or marked individuality of character. Strong, energetic, undisciplined, as lads they ran away from school; as men they shot big game and sought adventure in the wilds. All sorts of wild traditions floated through the family annals. A white man had been heard of as a medicine man of power among the Blackfeet Indians; and he was a Harford. The most daring pirate in the Chinese seas was said to be an Englishman, and if so, whose could he be but a Harford? The mysterious European always turning up as Mohammedan princes at Bagdad or Cairo, were Harfords, too, a man, and there was never a one who there was not a Harford, under an alias name in the workhouse or in prison serving a job, or sweeping a crossing. In short they were the modern representatives of the Vikings, the knight errant, the Crusaders, the Cossacques, the freebooters of all times and nations. But they made good members of society when they did settle down; and as owners of the estate were as hard on poachers as if they were not of the same kidney themselves.

The Jack Harford who had just died had been in his youth quite up to the family traditions for wilfulness which had not prevented his marrying a well connected lady, who gave him two children, and then no more. She died when young Anthony was about twelve years old and his sister Constance two years his junior, and next year the widower married again. Which second marriage, adding fuel to the fire of wild Harford blood, sent Anthony off on his unauthorized travels when he was eighteen, whence he did not return till brought back by his father's death and his own inheritance.

For the first months more pressing business than that Aspline trustee up took up his time and absorbed his attention. There was his father's widow to deal with, all his half brothers and sisters to see; their claims to look into to dispute when they could, and to settle with as good a grace as might be when he could not. Not that he was close fisted, nor yet selfish, but he had ever cherished that old resentment against the marriage which had landed him in the Wild West of America so soon as he had got his head; and he was reconciled to his step-mother no more now than before. No man who had ever crossed Anthony Harford's path, or inflicted on him any kind of loss or wrong, had lived long to celebrate his victory. But with all his fiery passions he had kept his masculine integrity without a flaw, and the man did not live who could say that Anthony Harford had "ever funked or ever lied," had hurt the defenceless, injured the innocent, or lured wife or maid to the undoing of her fair fame.

His return to old scenes and the consciousness of responsibility, together with that invisible but omnipotent influence of public opinion, wrought, as might be expected, on Anthony. At first he did not like the change. By degrees, however, the returned wanderer learnt the lesson of proportion, and narrowed the wide generosity of his first sweep to dimensions better fitted to home life. He no longer thought it a shame to accept little rents of a few pounds a year from laborers whose children went barefooted and whose cupboard often wanted bread. He held it as part of the obligations of his state as landlord and proprietor to higgle over every little improvement or repair needed by his tenants; and to force them, for the sake of the principle, to contribute so many shillings, on their own side—representing empty stomachs and shivering bodies, where he felt neither the outlay nor the saving more than he felt the weight of a fly on his shoulder. He was never a grasping landlord nor a greedy, and his name stood high in the country for largeness of generosity; but he learnt to curb his natural instincts into exacter conformity with the public feeling and general action of his class, and something of the scent of the wild sage bushes passed off him.

Brave as a lion, and as strong as he was brave; handsome as a Greek bronze; with the eyes of a scout and the port of a king; supple as a panther and stately as a stag Anthony Harford was one to move all women's hearts to love, all men's eyes to admiration.

After he had got all his own affairs in smooth working order, Anthony Harford bethought himself of that trusteeship which he had to take up. He wrote to Mrs Aspline a cold letter of business details. He began "Dear madam" and he ended "Truly yours." But at the end he infused a little dash of humanity, well iced, by hoping that her daughter, Miss Aspline, was well, and desiring to be recalled to her memory. The letter was purposely made incomplete and somewhat disappointing. He thought it would probably bring a request for a personal interview, which was what he desired, and was too proud to propose.

His little ruse had the desired effect. His letter piqued and annoyed Mrs Aspline: it piqued and disappointed Anne.

"This man is going to give worlds of trouble, I can see that!" said the mother, her face flushing seriously. "He is as stupid as boiled owl!" she added. And then she wished she had left out the boiled.

"He seems rather confused," said Anne, following her mother's lead at discreet distance, echoing her thought as faintly as the second rainbow repeats the first.

"I shall have to go to London to consult Mr. Niemand," said Mrs Aspline, peevishly. "I should so much like to have another trustee! This savage will never do any good. I dare say he has forgotten his own language by now."

"He writes correctly," said Anne, with an air of deliberation.

"Oh! his bailiff wrote for him," said Mrs. Aspline, with an air of conviction.

"If I were not afraid of his habits I would ask him to come here, and we could talk matters over," said Mrs. Aspline, who hated trouble and dreaded travelling.

"I dare say he would be bearable," returned Anne, who secretly wanted him to come, and privately intended that he should be asked.

"It will scarcely do for us to present a savage to our friends," said Mrs. Aspline, dubiously.

"No," said Anne; "unless he amused them. And Kingshouse is so dull, perhaps it would brighten up a little."

"But if he is horrid in his habits, Anne?" objected her mother.

"We must tell him," said Anne.

"I am sure I would not!" said Mrs. Aspline, warmly.

"I would if you like," said Anne, calmly.

"Well, Anne, if you like to take the responsibility of the creature, I am sure I do not mind," Mrs. Aspline returned, after a moment's pause. "Bad as he very likely is, Thrift is a lovely place, and the old family name is worth something, though the Harfords are such a queer lot. We are not responsible for him, after all. He stands on his own feet. He is not like a nobody whom we introduced and vouched for. He is a Harford when all is said and done. So perhaps I may venture."

"I think you may," said Anne, in her usual languid, dreamy manner, though she could scarcely repress the glad smile and frowning exclamation which rose naturally to her lips.

"I think you may," she said, "naturally, as it was you say, he is a Harford not an Aspline. Thrift combines a great many [illegible]

Hence it came about that Anthony's wish was fulfilled, and that a letter of invitation was sent to him at Thrift a letter almost as coldly worded as his own and written in Mrs. Aspline's scratchy, fugitive kind of hand, which gave top loops to all her consonants and lower twists to all her vowels, and took four times as much space as any one else would have taken.

"Good!" said Anthony Harford, when he received the letter. "I will go next week. I wonder what I shall find? Whether little Anne has grown into a bright girl or is a little cuss, and whether Cookey is as fat as she used to be when she gave me cakes and sweeties, and I thought her the prettiest lady in the country, who could beat whole lots hands down?"

CHAPTER II.

THE UNEXPECTED VISITOR.

Was it from ignorance or design that Anthony Harford dispensed with the formalities usual among civilized people, as touching the relations between guest and host, and set out for Hindfleet without notice given or time appointed? Even proud folk sometimes condescend to small ruses; and Anthony, though prouder than most, had thus condescended.

He wanted to take his old friends unawares, so that he might test them by that most trustworthy of all personal litmus—papers surprise. It was the old parable of the Virgins had the Asplines preserved their oil of affection for him, or had they wasted it?

In truth he was in the mood which makes what is called a "marrying man" ready to fall in love with the first likely girl who presented herself. Hence it was that shortly after the interchange of those formal business letters he packed up his portmanteau—so far as he had gone yet he disdained a man for his personal service—and he took the train to Kingshouse, driving up to Hindfleet unheralded, uninvited, and unexpected.

It was a dull winter's day, and the brief twilight was stealing on like a dusky web woven between sky and earth.

The whole scene, like the atmosphere, was so unutterably dispiriting that Anthony mentally wondered if the game were worth the candle, while he muttered into his damp beard a few objurgations of an American complexion, and drew his furlined coat more closely over his broad chest.

At last they made the lane which was so picturesque in summer, but which to-day was a mere way of slush and wreck, and turning sharply to the right, came to the lodge gates of a well-kept place, which the driver said briefly was Hindfleet.

"At last?" said Anthony, with a certain grim humor.

The servants were just beginning to close the shutters and light up the house as Anthony entered. Already the hall was aglow with light and warmth.

While he was taking off his coat, paying the man, and giving curt directions about his portmanteau—which he called a valise—his mind went back in parallel lines, and the past and present were equally distinct. He was sincerely moved, and prepared for an unwonted amount of enthusiasm. Hindfleet would be to him what the old Hall had been—his home; and the Asplines would be as his own. But while this rush of friendly sentiment was sweeping through his heart, Mrs. Aspline, in the drawing-room, looked at her daughter with dismay, and whispered in a voice of conventional horror: "Anne, I do verily believe that creature has come unannounced. Who on earth else would call on such a horrid evening as this, and be such a long time in the hall? What a fool he must be! My word!"

"Surely not," said Anne, with a slight flutter at her heart.

And then conjecture was ended by the servant opening the door, and "Mr. Harford" coming from the light of the hall into the semi-darkness of the room.

"You see, I took you at your word, and came right away without further notice," said a richly toned voice, with an unmistakable American accent.

Both ladies rose from their chairs, and went forward to meet their visitor. How stout dear old cookey had grown! She was like one of her own butter tubs set on feet.

And how slender that round little puff ball looked, outlined against the fire, which touched the edges of her dress and figure with a kind of fiery glow—half flame, half color.

"Why, here you both are, just as in old times, and I am right glad to see you again," he added, meeting them with both hands held out.

Mrs. Aspline had intended to be properly dignified, as became a lady a little offended by a liberty and stiffened by long absence; but hospitality conquered temper, and she greeted Anthony as warmly as if he had been the old friend expected and desired of his dreams. She was so completely taken aback by this sudden shifting of the wind, she was so embarrassed and discomfited, that she lost all vital hold over herself, and could only save herself from open confusion by this air of wooden hardness the appearance of icy insensibility.

"Only a little cuss," thought Anthony, in his adopted vernacular.

Only a cuss, but how pretty! And where lives the man for whom a woman's beauty does not count as a moral grace, excusing any amount of cussedness?

He shook hands with her as warmly as good breeding allowed. He would have made his hand press warmer had he dared.

Then he said, in the tone of one making a discovery, "Why, you have grown right tall, that's a fact!"

"Yes, I suppose I am taller than when you saw me last," said Anne, not knowing whether to most dislike the American intonation of that rich voice, or most admire the personality of the handsome speaker.

"She was only a tiny mite when you went away just a baby," said Mrs. Aspline, as her contribution to the inventory of reminiscences.

"Yes, just a baby," said Anthony, still holding Anne's hands and looking into her pretty face with his searching eyes, a little deep set in the orbit, and overshadowed by the straight, keen brows above. "Why! you were just a ball in my arms. I remember how I used to toss you about!—up to the skies and down again—as you used to say. And how you used to kick and scream, and pretend you didn't like it, and then ask for more. I may little thing you were! But you were a cunning little thing too; and now you are a young lady."

Anne put on a dignified little look and air. It seemed so odious to reap the fine edge of her modesties to remind her of those inconsiderate times. She was still the same actual creature as the humanized puff ball who had been tossed up in the air by those two large hands which held her own and grasped them with such a fervent pressure—who had been carried in those strong arms and set as a little queen on her throne on those broad shoulders and who had even been carried piggy-back, and kissed by those now bearded lips scores of times past counting.

"I do not remember," she said, coldly.

"I do," said Anthony, dryly.

He dropped her hands, and Anne no longer felt as if his eyes looked straight into her heart.

"Why did you not give us word of your arrival?" asked Mrs. Aspline, hospitably reproachful. "I would have sent to the station to meet you."

"It was not worth while," returned Anthony.

"It would have been pleasanter," Mrs. Aspline insisted.

"I found a buggy," he returned.

"That horrid fly with a broken kneed horse!" said Anne, with a smile that was intended to neutralize the flavor of her slightly acidulated prudery.

"They mostly are in this old country," said Anthony, with a very pronounced drawl; and again Anne hated him for his voice, but how handsome he was! how well he bore himself! like a king for patent dignity and that superb air of self-respect which is as indescribable as an aroma but as visible as light.

"Why, Anthony!" cried Mrs. Aspline, startled into familiarity. "Our English horses are superior to any in the world!"

"Fact?" queried Anthony. "I reckon one of our mustangs would give the pick of your old three legs as many points as you asked for, and beat you at a hand-gallop after. Have you a Maud S. in any of your stables? No, Mrs. Aspline; America takes the shine out of you for horseflesh just as for most else. So I tell you."

"Why, you have come back more an American than an Englishman," cried Anne, with quite a nice little smile.

"You bet!" said Anthony, briefly; and mother and daughter exchanged glances, which Anthony studied internally to see.

"I will fool them to the top of their bent," he said to himself; "and if they see my game, they are cuter than they look."

But now the scene shifted altogether, and the ordinary routine of hospitality had to be gone through—the room assigned, the luggage, that one black shiny valise, taken up, and the domestic programme arranged so as to include Anthony Harford as a guest for as many days as he would care to stay, or until the terms of the trusteeship should be satisfactorily settled.

"I wish she were franker, with more go in her, more substance," thought Anthony, as he dressed for dinner, and took more than ordinary pains with himself.

"What a pity he is so Americanized: He is not like an English gentleman," thought Anne, as she sat, her hands folded in her lap, and her opaque, white, square-shaped nails horribly conspicuous, while the maid arranged her hair, put in her earrings, and dressed her as she had been a doll or a child. "But he is very handsome," she thought again; "and perhaps that bad manner will wear off in time. At any rate he is our trustee, and I am bound to make the best of him."

But when they met a curious coldness had set in between them.

CHAPTER III.

UNDER THE MICROSCOPE.

The days passed, as these first days of meeting between old friends long separated always do pass, in noting the changes wrought by time, and feeling for the ground still left common. His central point was the passionless stoicism of an Indian. He would not praise, and he was never angry. He nearly caused Mrs. Aspline to topple off her chair in an apoplectic fit by his strictures on the House of Lords, primogeniture, the Three Estates, and an Established Church claiming to be National in the face of all the other sects; and he produced a silence like that of death when, to cap his audacious idea of a great English-speaking federation, he said that he would give the old country fifty years, and then she would be on her knees to the States, begging to be incorporated in the Union. And when Anthony said this, Mrs. Aspline, who had the passionate patriotism of one who knows no other country but her own, and who therefore despises all foreign nations as inferior and comparatively barbarous, forgot that he had ever been a favorite with her when a boy and Anne no longer thought him handsome.

Anne was as little given to hysterics as was her mother; but she, like that mother felt the want of outlook in their new friend with olden memories, and thought him horribly cold and "shut up." Yet he had something in his eyes and face that was by no means cold or restricted; and though they were so often irritated with him, they were forced to respect him even when most annoyed, and acknowledge his superiority. Deferential and full of thought for them as he was, he was yet their master, and they felt it.

To Anne this sense of power, of superiority, was a new sensation, which had both its pleasure and its discomfort. This old friend with a new face seemed to her almost the only real man she had ever seen—as different from the "curled darlings" she had hitherto known as shadows thrown on the screen are different from real things. What did the various young curates who had mesmerized this way, fresh from college and the cricket-field, know of life as such a man as Anthony Harford knew it? What was their experience of "sets" and "dons" compared to his of gamblers and miners, cow-boys and prospectors? What learning got out of musty old tomes equalled this studied from the living page of nature and humanity? Was Charlie Osborne's artistic perception of form and color equal to this, the very highest reach to which observation can go? Was Lord Eustace Inchbold's soldiering at the Horse Guards to be spoken of in the same breath as this other's deadly encounters with the bush-rangers and Indians, whose treachery he divined, and, divining, frustrated?

What Anthony thought of his fair friends and hostesses was his own secret only. He never made eyes at her, never said anything in a softer voice for no one else to hear, nor used phrases capable of bearing a second meaning. In all this he was as straight and as uninteresting as Addie. He criticised her freely, and he laughed at her in a good humored but always rather earnest manner.

She could do nothing with him. She failed to acknowledge that to herself—that inner self to whom we never lie.

If only he would have spoken and be confidential though to blame she would have been more content. Would have liked it less had she known that Anthony Harford had come in the mood which makes a marrying man that mood which looks for causes of content and admiration rather than the reverse—and that had she fed his nascent fire with but a sprinkling of brushwood, and not deadened it down with ashes, the whole run of his thoughts and his estimate of her would have been different. He would not have criticised so much, and he would have admired more. For minds have facets which reflect according to the angle, and tender growths of feeling are killed by coldness, as flowers in the garden when the frost comes.

We all know how in a country place small events swell into importance, like those Black Crows of immortal memory. The fact of Anthony Harford's arrival at Hindfleet went; the round of the restricted society at Kingshouse like the tearing of a piece of paper in the Ear of Dionysius. Rumor turned her magnifying glass chiefly on his fortune. That Thrift was a fine property as well as a pretty place, every one knew; but the rent as settled by the assessor of taxes was one thing, and Anthony's private pile made in America was another. How the private pile had been made was the great Proteus of conjecture, which changed its shape in each mouth whence it issued. By gambling, said some; by mining, said others he, Anthony Harford, the English gentleman working like and with those ruffians spoken of by Bret Harte—by "striking ile"; by shoddy; by slave-dealing; by political corruption; by a ring in cotton, railroads, stocks—what not. In any case, there was; and how heavy it lay on its owner's conscience, and whence it had sprung—in what slough of sin and crime its roots were planted—all these were his affair and no other person's. The one thing certain was that pile, which made the income of the owner of Thrift of more value than a Scotch duke's, and worthy the consideration of a German princess.

Naturally the Asplines were "in society" in Kingshouse, but they were not among the more cherished members. They were received, as of course, in this plutocratic age, but no one made much account of them—no one forged with them such strong links of friendship, for instance, as those which bound Lady Elizabeth and Estelle. They were slightly in a false position—social coffins of Mohammed, suspended between two spheres and belonging to neither. They were above the need of such patronage and instruction as Caleb Stag required to make him in any way passable and they were just a line below the high water-mark of even a country place.

LETTERS FROM THE FARM.

Specially Written for The Advance.

Life on the farm is just booming. I have grown two inches since last fall and weigh fifteen pounds more and [illegible] them, and all on account of that we [illegible]. There is nothing calculated to [illegible] muscle [illegible] than farming. For instance, they raise calves, colts, [illegible] puppies on milk and [illegible] have to exert themselves [illegible] which in my opinion, is not according to the natural times of things. That reminds me. Yesterday our teacher sent me out for six birch gads. She wanted to teach me the gaudy dance. I got the gads, took them to my beloved teacher and got them again. While I was getting them the first time I tenderly raised the bark in places and backed them, like George Washington, only I smoothed the bark back so that I wouldn't have to tell a lie about it and say I didn't do it. Birch bark is the best to do that with. When I got them the second time they fell on my back like the gentle taps of a fairie's wand and didn't hurt worth a cent. I smiled blandly at my fellow pupils and stood it all with a heroism worthy of the early martyrs. Five gads were thus made into matches. The sixth then started to get in its fine work, and when the first blow fell I knew there was something wrong. It whistled through the atmosphere with a business air that informed me I had forgotten to hack it. When it lit I knew the information was correct. The recoil made me jump two feet high, and the magnetism engendered in my body just made my two legs fly around that school house, over desks and under them, but that gad attended strictly to business and kept industriously whacking away fiercely, with a tenacity worthy of a more just cause. The only satisfaction I got out of this thrashing was to hear father belaboring the wood pile late at night while I lay in bed, swathed in bandages and liniment. The moral of this story is, when you undertake a job do it well. I don't much care, though, for I shall lay in bed a week, if sugar making don't start in the meantime.

'Martha and her young man had a good time in the parlor last night. You see Martha's dear little brother was out of the way. But I'll fool them some night soon—see if I don't. We have four new calves (including Mat's beaux) and they are all beauties excepting the beaux calf. He is red-haired and wears side whiskers. The others are red, too, but they don't have to wear any such measly-looking red clay mutton chops as the beaux calf. Wait till Mat reads this! We have eight lambs, but Redney isn't one of them. He's no lamb. He held me the other evening while Mat hunted through my pockets and stole a letter. Of course it was her letter, but I don't believe in using force until all kinds of argument are exhausted. That is what makes so much misery in this world. Man arrayed against man, and fight, fight, until one is cowed but not convinced. Now I'm going to steal another letter, sure as guns, and I'll show it to all the boys, and send it to you to publish in The Advance. See if I don't! When I think of that coersive measure of theirs it makes me madder'n the licking did. It makes me so mad that I can't write no more. O rover, as as the Frenchman says.

CANADA'S NEW PARTY.

Canada has a new third party. This much seems really to be decided. She has a new third party, and that party met in solemn convention in Association Hall, Toronto, last Thursday to organize and blow the first blast upon their trumpet. The platform is a large one, including nine broad planks as follows:

PLATFORM.

1. Rightcousness and truth in public affairs as well as in private business, and no compromises with wrong.
2. Equal rights for all creeds, classes and nationalities, but exclusive privileges for none.
3. A national sentiment, a national literature, and in all matters of public policy—our country first.
4. The prompt and absolute prohibition of the liquor traffic, and the honest and vigorous enforcement of all other laws for the repression of vice and intemperance.
5. Retrenchment and economy in public expenditure, with the view of reducing our enormous national debt.
6. Manhood suffrage, with an educational qualification; that is, a vote to every freeman of legal age who can read and write.
7. The extension of the franchise of women.
8. An elective Senate.
9. Civil service reform.

It is a cleverly constructed platform, and is intended to be far reaching in its scope. It is an octopus with nine tentacles, and each tentacle was specially constructed with a view to the enfolding of a certain species of political and moral belief. In this arrangement, however, there is a very great danger under which the New Party labors, and that is the possibility of the bulk of its vari-colored tentacles proving more of a repulsive force than that of the individual ones to draw.

One of its most serious drawbacks is the arraying of creed against creed and nationality against nationality, which certainly must follow the adoption of its Temperance plank and its bitter opposition to Roman Catholic educational privileges in Quebec. Then its seventh plank is a bone of contention in Ontario. So also is the eighth. The nineth is something which every local and provincial government since confederation has professed to embrace in its platform. Taken as a whole, however, the platform of the New Party is a good one—providing that it were changeable, which it is not. It is made up of too many cross purposes and conflicting interests, ever to obtain the object for which it has been inaugurated.

We have no wish to be thought inquisitive, but would some one kindly inform us as to the whereabouts of Volapuk?

The Ontario Legislature ceased from its arduous duties on Saturday last for another year. It has waded through a large number of bills—an even hundred—but a very few of them are of general importance, exclusive of the Act to amend the Franchise Act.

The debate upon the Jesuit Bill was commenced in the Dominion Parliament Tuesday.

Thursday, April 4th, will be a great day in the history of the Scott Act. On that day fifteen elections to decide whether the Temperance Act shall or shall not be repealed will be held in as many counties in Canada—chiefly in Ontario. The latest additions to the lists are Lincoln, Ontario, and Carleton.

Bulletin No 7, issued from the laboratory of the Inland Revenue Department, gives some startling information regarding adulteration of lard. It asserts that the lard manufactured in Canada is comparatively pure, while that imported from certain American manufacturing firms is so highly adulterated, chiefuly with cotton seed oil, that "with some of the samples it seems very doubtful as to whether any lard can be present." Of Canadian lard, ouly 3 out of 35 samples tested were adulterated. From several thousand samples of American lard examined only one was free from adulteration. This is another article which we cannot understand the wisdom of allowing free access to Canada under unrestricted reciprocity, to the detriment of the Canadian farmer.

An American author, D. A. Wells, says "Ontario is nearly as large in area as new York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio combined, and equal, if not superior, to those states as a whole in its agricultural capacity, it raises and grazes the finest of cattle, and its climatic conditions created by an almost encirclement of the Great Lakes especially fit it to grow men. Such a country is one of the greatest gifts of Providence to the human race, better than bonanzas of silver or rivers whose sands contain gold." And yet there are people in Canada who call themselves Canadians and who do not appreciate this grand heritage, but would desire to hand themselves and country over to a knave who fully understands the value of this coveted jewel. Thank heaven such unappreciative individuals are in the great minority, and are likely to remain there.

That Challenge Accepted.

To the Editor of The Advance.

DEAR SIR,—An item appeared in your paper of the 14th inst. over the signature of J. Ferguson, in the interests of Frook & Co., challenging the South Line boys to saw a cord of wood, or to saw on specified time for the sum of ten dollars. Again in last week's issue another article appeared, in which gas was effused in dangerous quantities. Now, Mr. Editor, we never bet unless we mean business. We will saw the said company for the amount above stipulated, one cord or on time, brakes not to be considered. Therefore, to use their own slang phrases, "put up or shut up," for when gnats grow troublesome we brush them aside.

Bailiffs Williams, Findlay and Frank, of Elora and Fergus, attempted to seize the goods and chattels of a Garafraxa farmer the other day. They gained admission and took a seat by the stove. The farmer's wife put a pan on the stove as if to cook something, and while around the stove poured red pepper on it. Then locking all the doors but the one leading outside, left the pepper to do the rest. It did it. The bailiffs soon beat a retreat, and once outside were barred out.

The Past.

For six years I have labored to establish a living business on the basis of honorable dealing with all—handling reliable goods at fair prices, and endeavoring to give "value received" every time goods are exchanged for money, note or credit. I have been "thrust" into something of success by the genuine support of a large section of "Central Grey" which would not have come if "undeserved."

The Present

Being fully established on the above lines, and having a very complete stock in all regular jewelers' lines, I shall expect and endeavor to still deserve the confidence and support of all past patrons, and will hope to gain new ones as 1889 rolls along.

The Future.

I trust to be able this year to keep my stock even better assorted for customers to select from. Will continue to buy from A 1 firms at closest possible prices, and offer all buyers reliab[le] watches "bed rock" pr[ices] ited. Goods a[s]

A STALLION KILLS A BEAR.

Goes Gallantly to the Rescue of His Master, Who Has Given up the Fight.

A Scranton, Pa., despatch says: Delos Woodcock, who lives in the southwest corner of Lehigh township, owns an old stallion that he calls Harry. The horse is a chunky brown animal of a Canadian variety, nearly 17 years old. He has a large mane and foretop, and a thick black tail, and for years he has been so cross and vicious that no one except Mr. Woodcock could handle him in the stable or harness him. Mr. Woodcock, who owns a small farm in sight of the Lehigh River, has had the stallion for eleven years, and twice during that time the horse has come within an ace of killing his owner, and Mr. Woodcock has often threatened to sell old Harry for what he could get; but he has had the animal so long that he hated to part with him, and now he says he is glad he didn't sell the horse. The reason why he says he is glad is because the vicious old brute saved his life on Monday, and since then Mr Woodcock has looked upon old Harry as a hero.

Late on that afternoon Mr. Woodcock rode the stallion over to Giles Chadwick's place after a bag of oats of a new variety that he wanted to sow in the spring. Chadwick lives on a hill between Trout and Tobyhanna Creek, and the distance between the two farms is nearly two miles by the shortest cut. For a mile and a half the route leads along the west side of what is known as the Big Marsh and through a long strip of timber land. Mr. Woodcock's little dog Josh tagged along behind the old stallion on the way over to Chadwick's. It was about sundown when Mr. Woodcock placed the bag of seed oats on the old stallion's back, mounted the horse behind it, and left Chadwick's place for his own home across the Lehigh. Owing to the bag of oats the horse could not go faster than a walk, and it was getting dark when he struck the woodland path close to the side of the Big Marsh. Up to that time the little dog Josh had been trotting along in the rear of the old stallion, but all at once Mr. Woodcock noticed that Josh was not following the horse, and so he reined the stallion in and whistled for the dog to come on. Josh made no response to his master's call, and Mr. Woodcock wheeled the horse around, rode back a few rods and called aloud to the dog. Just then he heard Josh yelping on the frozen surface of the laurel and alder-covered swamp, and he rode the horse back and forth, and tried to catch a glimpse of the dog through the openings in the bushes, still calling Josh by name and coaxing him to come out; but the little dog paid no attention to the repeated calls, barking more furiously than ever, and seeming to be teasing some kind of an animal with all the energy he possessed, and Mr. Woodcock, seeing that it was impossible for him to make the dog mind, concluded to hitch the horse and go into the swamp to see what Josh had tackled. Mr. Woodcock said that Josh yelped like sixty just then, and so he dismounted, took off the bag of oats and placed it on the ground near the roots of a tree, and was leading the stallion toward a sapling to hitch him, when out of the swamp sprang the little dog howling from fright. Close to his heels tramped an old she bear, frothing at the mouth and snorting, and it was she that Josh had been yelping at and disturbing in her nest under the roots of a fallen tree. Mr. Woodcock said that the little dog ran past him as though he was scared half to death and got out of sight in no time, and that he himself was so startled by the bear's sudden appearance that he forgot to hitch the horse. The angry old bear seemed to think no more about her tormentor the moment she saw the bag of oats lying there, for she pounced upon it with a roar that made the stallion prick up his ears and look mad, and began to rip and tear it all to pieces and make the precious seed oats fly. Mr. Woodcock said this caper of the old bear's caused him to act more suddenly than he usually does, and that, without stopping to hitch the stallion to the sapling, he grabbed a dead limb, rushed at the bear, and began to maul her over the head. The first blow made her bellow but instead of turning tail, as he expected she would, she plunged at him and knocked him heels over head, forced him over in the snow, and nearly broke one of his legs. He squirmed from under her paws, feeling that she would kill him before he could get to the horse, for in the struggle he had lost his club; but just as he got upon his knees the bear sprang at him with another roar, and pitched him head first into a mass of bushes near the side of the path. Then he was sure that the old bear would kill him, but he pulled himself away from her by grabbing hold of some short twigs, and just then he heard the old stallion snort a couple of times, as he had heard the animal do before when he was real mad, and the next thing he realized the horse bounded past him and came down on the bear with both fore feet. The weight of the horse and the sharp calks on his shoes tore the bear's hide, but that only made her more murderous than ever, as she turned upon the horse and tried to strike him down. By this time Mr. Woodcock had got his arms around a tree, where he could see what was going on. All of the stallion's old viciousness seemed to have come back to him in an instant, for he struck at the bear with his fore feet at least half a dozen times in less than a minute, tearing the bear's flesh and hide at every lunge. The bear drew blood on the stallion's shoulder once, and then the horse gave a snort of rage, whirled as quick as a flash, and drove both of his hind feet against the bear's left side three or four times. That knocked the wind out of the bear, but the horse was not through with her yet, for he right about faced and went to stamping on her, keeping that up until he had killed her. When the bear had stopped kicking, Mr. Woodcock said the stallion cooled off and acted as if he was satisfied. It was pretty dark by that time, and Mr. Woodcock, who had been badly bruised by the bear, and whose face had been considerably scratched in the briars, picked up what was left of the injured bag, mounted the horse and rode home. Little Josh had got there before him and had sneaked into the house with his tail between his legs, the bear having frightened him so much that he couldn't be got to leave the house for three days.

On Tuesday morning Mr. Woodcock and Giles Gooderich, a neighbor, went to where the dead bear lay. In the course of half an hour they found her nest, and in it lay two tiny cubs snug and warm, but very hungry. They took the cunning little fellows home with them, fed them milk from a bottle and kept them where it was warm, and yesterday the cubs were all right. Mr. Woodcock means to keep the old stallion till death takes him away.

DREADFUL DOMESTIC TRAGEDY.

A Man Murders His Father-in-Law, Mother-in-Law and Brother-in-Law and Suicides.

An Austin, Nev, despatch says: A frightful tragedy occurred at Italian canyon, twelve miles from here, Thursday afternoon. Samuel Rundle killed his father-in-law, George Hosking, and his brother-in-law, aged 15, by shooting them with a shotgun, the charge entering the neck and severing the jugular vein of the former and tearing away the face of the latter. A boy named John King, hearing the shot, came toward the house. He was met by Rundle, holding the gun. The latter asked the boy to shoot him. The boy refused. Rundle then took the boy's horse and rode three miles to the lower ranche, entered the house, and with his pistol shot Mrs. Hosking in the head and then shot himself in about the same spot. The four bodies were found at the two ranches lying at right angles, forming a cross. The shooting was the result of a family quarrel over a division of property.

TWO TRAPPERS LOST.

Donald and John Finlayson Perish in the Far Northwest.

A Prince Albert, N.W.T., despatch says: Intelligence has just been received from Cumberland of the death of two trappers named Finlayson. The brothers left the Carrot River settlement, about forty miles from here, last August for Deer Lake, taking with them provisions and a trading outfit, intending remaining all winter trading in that region. After getting settled they started for the H. B. Co.'s post, 200 miles farther north and at the other end of the lake, and had not been seen since until a short time ago, when a Hudson Bay trapper discovered their dead bodies about two miles from their camp. It is supposed they were lost on the lake, and their provisions giving out they were starved to death before they could reach home. They belonged to Paris, Ont.

SHE REFUSED MEDICINE.

Death of a Believer in Christian Science in Brooklyn.

A Brooklyn despatch says: Mrs. Dewey, wife of the well-known New York wine merchant, George Dewey, died of consumption a week ago. She was a believer in Christian science and refused medical treatment until within a few days of her death, when Mr. Dewey insisted on calling in Dr. Fisk. The physician found that Mrs. Dewey's lungs were almost gone and recovery was impossible. Mr. Dewey had been favorably inclined to the Christian Scientists, but he is now disposed to make trouble for them. The matter is causing considerable discussion.

MARRIED HIM, ANYWAY.

She Had to be Taken from a Sick Bed and Carried Downstairs.

A Wilkesbarre, Pa., despatch says: Miss Fannie Robinson, a well-known young lady of this city, was taken from her sick bed yesterday, carried downstairs and married to W. D. Griffin. The groom came from a long distance once before to marry his betrothed, but she was taken suddenly ill and the event was postponed. This time the bride would not consent to postponement.

SLIDING ON THE BALUSTRADE.

A Boy's Fatal Accident—He Slipped and Fell Three Stories.

A Jamestown, N. Y., telegram says: Last (Thursday) evening Fred. Haskell, 8 years old, was playing in the Sherman House sliding down the balustrade from the third story. He lost his hold and fell to the stone pavement of the office, a distance of 30 feet. He struck on his head, fracturing the skull. There is no chance for his recovery.

Startling Experience on a Railway.

Some four days ago as No. 1 was rushing along past Stayner Falls, Conductor Nidd's attention was drawn to one of his lady passengers who was apparently ill, and bending over the lady with motherly solicitude she whispered something in his ear which made his hair stand on end like quills on the fretful porcupine. He soon went to the other lady passengers, explained the nature of the news which had so startled him, and requested their assistance, when, much to his astonishment, they all cleared into the next car and left him alone with his patient. Hastily rushing into the sleeping car he obtained some bedding, and shortly after the lusty voice of a fine young boy was heard above the rattling of the train. She was taken on to North Bay, where medical assistance was procured and kindly hands carried mother and new-born child to the hotel. On the news being flashed to Montreal directions came back to christen the youngster "Van Horne," and the company directed the conductor to assume the title of "Doctor," his visiting cards now reading "Doctor Nidd, accoucheur-general to the C. P. R." —Algoma Gossip.

Cure for Insomnia.

Recently there came to work in a Brookfield (Conn.) family a Swedish woman, who, hearing of a young woman's trouble from insomnia, told her of the practice of people in her country who are similarly afflicted. It was to take a napkin, dip it in ice-cold water, wring it slightly, and lay it across her eyes. The plan was followed and it worked like a charm. The first night the girl slept four hours without awakening, something she had not done for several months. At the end of that time the napkin had become dry. By wetting it again she at once went to sleep, and it required considerable force to rouse her in the morning.

Many a young man finds his courtship come to a full stop when it reaches the interrogation point.

The comedy in which Mr. William H. Crane will star next season is called "The Balloon," and is now running at the Strand Theatre in London.

THE DEADLY BOILER.

Five Men Killed and Eleven Injured by a Boiler Explosion.

A last (Thursday) night's Pittsburg despatch says: A boiler explosion occurred in Morris' foundry, on 23rd street, this city, to-day, killing a number of men and injuring others. The explosion occurred just after the noon whistle had sounded, and many of the workmen had left the works to get their dinners. The concussion shook buildings for several squares. In a few minutes a large crowd had gathered about the wreck, and the scene was most agonizing. Wives, mothers and children ran about crying and eagerly searching for their loved ones. The work of rescue is going on vigorously. Four are believed to be still buried beneath the debris, and it is found many more were caught in the wreck. The cause of the explosion has not been learned.

The building was a large, one-story brick structure. The plant was worth $20,000, and will prove a complete loss. Nothing remains but a mass of brick, mortar and timbers. The concussion shattered windows and damaged houses for three blocks around, and it is s

RESCUED FROM DEATH.

The Glad Deliverance of Five Miners Imprisoned in a Mine.

A Mount Carmel, Pa., despatch says: Five of the six miners at Black Diamond Colliery have been rescued alive and well, and the sixth will soon be brought to the surface. Hall and Revels, though suffering extremely from nervous exhaustion, gave to-night the first account of their experience. These two were driving near the shutes in breast No. 8, in the south slope of the mine, about noon yesterday, when they heard a terrific roar, and the next minute they experienced a shock which caused Hall to exclaim, "My God, Nick, the slope has caved in." Revels descended to the gangway, and 12 feet from it found their egress to the slope cut off by huge rocks. He called to the miners working in No. 7, and soon saw Pokus crawling from the debris. They both joined in the shouts, and then heard Hearshallsky calling from No. 7 chamber for help. He was pinioned by a large rock, and urged his comrades to come to his rescue. They climbed up a distance, but the danger grew so great that they had

In the air;
There is mud under foot
Everywhere;
And objects (long hid by the beautiful snow),
Which we had forgot, are beginning to show
Here and there.

Old rubbers and shoes,
And sniplets and chews,
Empty pint and quart bottles, no matter whose,
And no end of things we no longer can use——
And oh, oh, oh.

Here a whiff of old garbage beginning to blow,
And hark! there's the crocus beginning to crow—
Loud let us sing
Welcome to spring,
The time for uncovering everything.

Mr. Meredith—But the jail is seventy miles away from you.

Mr. Hardy—But that is not the point he is trying to get at.

Mr Gibson (Huron), continuing, said that he never knew of any person yet who had entered a High School to return to the farm. The money spent on High Schools would be much better spent in developing and building railways in the unsettled districts.

Dr. McLaughlin said he knew numbers of professional gentlemen who would never have occupied their present positions had it not been for free schools, free high schools and a free university. difficult to get Conservative hotel-keepers to promise him either their votes or support, so apprehensive were they of disastrous results to themselves. He did not believe the same abuses would occur if the County Councils were again given control of the license boards.

Mr. McLaughlin challenged the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Willoughby) to formulate his charges so that an investigation might be held. As to the retrogressive change proposed by the Opposition, the whole temperance and church sentiment of the country was opposed to it.

Mr. Awrey said that the hotel-keepers were the supporters of Dr. Willoughby in East Northumberland. His agents were hotel-keepers, and it was very amusing to see him call his supporters martyrs to the liquor license laws.

Mr. Awrey continued the debate. He taunted the Opposition with making vague charges in wholesale which they could not substantiate. For fourteen years in his riding there had not been a complaint against the administration of the Crooks Act.

Mr. Clancy said that the administration of the Crooks Act and the Scott Act by the Government had brought both into contempt. The principle contended for by the Opposition was that it was not possible to administer the Liquor License Act in an honest manner if the Government—any Government—had control of the license boards.

Mr. Ballantyne contended that the Crooks Act had been admirably administered. Under the previous system inspection of liquor places was a farce, everybody who applied got a license, and liquor was sold at all hours. As to the Scott Act it was impossible to enforce it because the people did not sympathize with the measure.

The House divided and the amendment was lost. Yeas 23, nays 43.

YEAS—Messrs. Blyth, Clancy, Clarke, E. F. (Toronto), Clarke, H. E. (Toronto), Craig, Creighton, Hammell, Hudson, Ingram, Kerns, Lees, Meacham, Meredith, Monk, Morgan, Preston, Rorke, Smith (Frontenac), Stewart, Tooley, Whitney, Willoughby, Wood (Hastings) —23.

NAYS — Messrs. The House then went into Committee of Supply and passed several items of the estimates.

Mr. Meredith asked if there was any truth in the rumor that the Government had changed its policy on the railway question.

Mr. Mowat said the Government policy would be found in the notice of motion given by Mr. A. M. Ross.

DISCOLORED JEWELLERY.

Sometimes the Gold, Sometimes the Wearer Causes It.

Sometimes it is the gold and sometimes the girl that makes jewellery crock, as is evidenced by the following from the Jewellers' Weekly:

Shortly after the holidays there came into my place a pleasant-mannered young man who expressed a desire to look at some gold necklaces. It is needless to say that I sold him one. It was fourteen carats and very pretty. Two days later the door was flung open and in rushed the same young man, boiling with rage. He threw the necklace on the counter, demanding the return of his money, and threatened to expose me as a swindler. It took half an hour to learn his story. It seems that after presenting the necklace to his lady love he had taken her to a reception ornamented with his present. After the first dance there was a commotion in one corner of the room, and the rivals of our customer's best girl were tittering among themselves and whispering about her. The young lady looked in the glass and almost fainted at the sight. Her beautiful neck was almost black from the friction of the necklace. She changed her mind about fainting, returned home with her brother, and sent the necklace back to her young man with a note that she did not like the brass. I tested the necklace in his presence, and proved to him that it was full 14 carats. About that time a young physician called to purchase a scarf-pin. He had overheard part of the story and asked to hear the balance, as he believed he could throw some light on the subject. Pretty soon he laughed outright and said: "Why, sir, the trouble is with your girl and not the necklace. She has too much sulphur, iron, mercury, salt or acid in her blood, and as any of these substances has an affinity for gold the explanation is clear. I have patients for whom mercurial medicines have been prescribed, and the result is that their fingers upon which rings are worn discolor at once." My customer cooled off and carried his purchase away.

Householder—"Well, the pipes haven't frozen once this winter If you like it buy it."

The motion passed.

Mr. Dance moved that this House, recognizing that the High Schools and Collegiate Institutes of this Province have in the past proved of great service to education, and while not questioning the necessity of their being maintained in an efficient condition, is of opinion that the time has arrived when such schools should be more largely supported by fees, and that the law be so amended as to make it compulsory that fees should be charged to pupils attending such schools. He explained that he had brought the matter before the House for the purpose of having it discussed as he thought the time was ripe for some action. If not this session at least next session.

Mr. Ross (Middlesex) explained that the imposition of fees was increasing. Many of those who enter the schools did so for the purpose of qualifying themselves for the teaching profession. The Government would consider the matter and perhaps take action.

Mr. Metcalf considered that the imposition of fees would be a retrogressive step in public education. He believed the High Schools should be as free as the Public Schools.

Mr. Meredith said it would be unfair to compel High Schools that were willing to give free education to charge fees. At present the High Schools could charge fees if they wished. Many of the schools only charged fees to outsiders.

Mr. Wood supported the motion.

Mr. Gibson (Huron) wanted parish assistant Police Magistrate on a majority vote of the Municipal Councils.

Mr. Meredith objected to a bare majority of the Council passing on the matter, and proposed an amendment to the effect that it would require a two-third vote of the Council present to pass such a resolution

Mr Mowat said the clause dealt principally with the city of Toronto, and asked for Mr. E. F. Clarke's opinion on the clause.

Mr. E. F. Clarke said the city had not passed on the advisability of appointing an assistant magistrate yet, but he thought perhaps it would be as well to amend the clause as suggested by Mr. Meredith.

Mr. Mowat consented and the amendment was adopted.

Mr. Gibson's (Hamilton) Bill to amend the Division Courts Act was passed through Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Meredith objected to clause 21, which authorized the summoning for debt, and the garnishee of their salaries, in the cases of young unmarried men, irrespective of the extent of their salaries. He said that in many of these cases a summons for debt would mean a dismissal by the employer. Tradesmen ought to be taught not to encourage these young men to take credit.

Mr. Hardy thought the young men ought to be taught not to run into debt.

The clause passed.

The committee rose and reported progress.

The debate on the motion for going into Committee of Supply, and Mr. Meredith's amendment thereto condemning the liquor license administration, was resumed.

Mr. Wylie said the Government control of the license boards worked injuriously in cases of close election contests. Partisan influence was said to be exerted in these instances. At his own election he found it ces Gallantly to the Rescue of His Master, Who Has Given up the Fight.

A STALLION KILLS A BEAR.

A Scranton, Pa., despatch says: Delos Woodcock, who lives in the southwest corner of Lehigh township, owns an old stallion that he calls Harry. The horse is a chunky brown animal of a Canadian variety, nearly 17 years old. He has a large mane and foretop, and a thick black tail, and for years he has been so cross and vicious that no one except Mr. Woodcock could handle him in the stable or harness him. Mr. Woodcock, who owns a small farm in sight of the Lehigh River, has had the stallion for eleven years, and twice during that time the horse has come within an ace of killing his owner, and Mr. Woodcock has often threatened to sell old Harry for what he could get; but he has had the animal so long that he hated to part with him, and now he says he is glad he didn't sell the horse. The reason why he says he is glad is because the vicious old brute saved his life on Monday, and since then Mr Woodcock has looked upon old Harry as a hero.

Late on that afternoon Mr. Woodcock rode the stallion over to Giles Chadwick's place after a bag of oats of a new variety that he wanted to sow in the spring. Chadwick lives on a hill between Trout and Tobyhanna Creek, and the distance between the two farms is nearly two miles by the shortest cut. For a mile and a half the route leads along the west side of what is known as the Big Marsh and through a long strip of timber land. Mr. Woodcock's little dog Josh tagged along behind the old stallion on the way over to Chadwick's. It was about sundown when Mr. Woodcock placed the bag of seed oats on the old stallion's back, mounted the horse behind it, and left Chadwick's place for his own home across the Lehigh. Owing to the bag of oats the horse could not go faster than a walk, and it was getting dark when he struck the woodland path close to the side of the Big Marsh. Up to that time the little dog Josh had been trotting along in the rear of the old stallion, but all at once Mr. Woodcock noticed that Josh was not following the horse, and so he reined the stallion in and whistled for the dog to come on. Josh made no response to his master's call, and Mr. Woodcock wheeled the horse around, rode back a few rods and called aloud to the dog. Just then he heard Josh yelping on the frozen surface of the laurel and alder-covered swamp, and he rode the horse back and forth, and tried to catch a glimpse of the dog through the openings in the bushes, still calling Josh by name and coaxing him to come out; but the little dog paid no attention to the repeated calls, barking more furiously than ever, and seeming to be teasing some kind of an animal with all the energy he possessed, and Mr. Woodcock, seeing that it was impossible for him to make the dog mind, concluded to hitch the horse and go into the swamp to see what Josh had tackled. Mr. Woodcock said that Josh yelped like sixty just then, and so he dismounted, took off the bag of oats and placed it on the ground near the roots of a tree, and was leading the stallion toward a sapling to hitch him, when out of the swamp sprang the little dog howling from fright. Close to his heels tramped an old she bear, frothing at the mouth and snorting, and it was she that Josh had been yelping at and disturbing in her nest under the roots of a fallen tree. Mr. Woodcock said that the little dog ran past him as though he was scared half to death and got out of sight in no time, and that he himself was so startled by the bear's sudden appearance that he forgot to hitch the horse. The angry old bear seemed to think no more about her tormentor the moment she saw the bag of oats lying there, for she pounced upon it with a roar that made the stallion prick up his ears and look mad, and began to rip and tear it all to pieces and make the precious seed oats fly. Mr. Woodcock said this caper of the old bear's caused him to act more suddenly than he usually does, and that, without stopping to hitch the stallion to the sapling, he grabbed a dead limb, rushed at the bear, and began to maul her over the head. The first blow made her bellow but instead of turning tail, as he expected she would, she plunged at him and knocked him heels over head, forced him over in the snow, and nearly broke one of his legs. He squirmed from under her paws, feeling that she would kill him before he could get to the horse, for in the struggle he had lost his club; but just as he got upon his knees the bear sprang at him with another roar, and pitched him head first into a mass of bushes near the side of the path. Then he was sure that the old bear would kill him, but he pulled himself away from her by grabbing hold of some short twigs, and just then he heard the old stallion snort a couple of times, as he had heard the animal do before when he was real mad, and the next thing he realized the horse bounded past him and came down on the bear with both fore feet. The weight of the horse and the sharp calks on his shoes tore the bear's hide, but that only made her more murderous than ever, as she turned upon the horse and tried to strike him down. By this time Mr. Woodcock had got his arms around a tree, where he could see what was going on. All of the stallion's old viciousness seemed to have come back to him in an instant, for he struck at the bear with his fore feet at least half a dozen times in less than a minute, tearing the bear's flesh and hide at every lunge. The bear drew blood on the stallion's shoulder once, and then the horse gave a snort of rage, whirled as quick as a flash, and drove both of his hind feet against the bear's left side three or four times. That knocked the wind out of the bear, but the horse was not through with her yet, for he right about faced and went to stamping on her, keeping that up until he had killed her. When the bear had stopped kicking, Mr. Woodcock said the stallion cooled off and acted as if he was satisfied. It was pretty dark by that time, and Mr. Woodcock, who had been badly bruised by the bear, and whose face had been considerably scratched in the briars, picked up what was left of the injured bag, mounted the horse and rode home. Little Josh had got there before him and had sneaked into the house with his tail between his legs, the bear having frightened him so much that he couldn't be got to leave the house for three days

On Tuesday morning Mr. Woodcock and Giles Gooderich, a neighbor, went to where the dead bear lay. In the course of half an hour they found her nest, and in it lay two tiny cubs snug and warm, but very hungry. They took the cunning little fellows home with them, fed them milk from a bottle and kept them where it was warm, and yesterday the cubs were all right. Mr. Woodcock means to keep the old stallion till death takes him away.

DREADFUL DOMESTIC TRAGEDY.

A Man Murders His Father-in-Law, Mother-in-Law and Brother-in-Law and Suicides.

An Austin, Nev, despatch says: A frightful tragedy occurred at Italian canyon, twelve miles from here, Thursday afternoon. Samuel Rundle killed his father-in-law, George Hosking, and his brother-in-law, aged 15, by shooting them with a shotgun, the charge entering the neck and severing the jugular vein of the former and tearing away the face of the latter. A boy named John King, hearing the shot, came toward the house. He was met by Rundle, holding the gun. The latter asked the boy to shoot him. The boy refused. Rundle then took the boy's horse and rode three miles to the lower ranche, entered the house, and with his pistol shot Mrs. Hosking in the head and then shot himself in about the same spot. The four bodies were found at the two ranches lying at right angles, forming a cross. The shooting was the result of a family quarrel over a division of property.

TWO TRAPPERS LOST.

Donald and John Finlayson Perish in the Far Northwest.

A Prince Albert, N.W.T., despatch says: Intelligence has just been received from Cumberland of the death of two trappers named Finlayson. The brothers left the Carrot River settlement, about forty miles from here, last August for Deer Lake, taking with them provisions and a trading outfit, intending remaining all winter trading in that region. After getting settled they started for the H. B. Co.'s post, 200 miles farther north and at the other end of the lake, and had not been seen since until a short time ago, when a Hudson Bay trapper discovered their dead bodies about two miles from their camp. It is supposed they were lost on the lake, and their provisions giving out they were starved to death before they could reach home. They belonged to Paris, Ont.

SHE REFUSED MEDICINE.

Death of a Believer in Christian Science in Brooklyn.

A Brooklyn despatch says: Mrs. Dewey, wife of the well-known New York wine merchant, George Dewey, died of consumption a week ago. She was a believer in Christian science and refused medical treatment until within a few days of her death, when Mr. Dewey insisted on calling in Dr. Fisk. The physician found that Mrs. Dewey's lungs were almost gone and recovery was impossible. Mr. Dewey had been favorably inclined to the Christian Scientists, but he is now disposed to make trouble for them. The matter is causing considerable discussion.

The groom came from a long distance once before to marry his betrothed, but she was taken suddenly ill and the event was postponed. This time the bride would not consent to postponement.

Startling Experience on a Railway.

Some four days ago as No. 1 was rushing along past Stayner Falls, Conductor Nidd's attention was drawn to one of his lady passengers who was apparently ill, and bending over the lady with motherly solicitude she whispered something in his ear which made his hair stand on end like quills on the fretful porcupine. He soon went to the other lady passengers, explained the nature of the news which had so startled him, and requested their assistance, when, much to his astonishment, they all cleared into the next car and left him alone with his patient. Hastily rushing into the sleeping car he obtained some bedding, and shortly after the lusty voice of a fine young boy was heard above the rattling of the train. She was taken on to North Bay, where medical assistance was procured and kindly hands carried mother and new-born child to the hotel. On the news being flashed to Montreal directions came back to christen the youngster "Van Horne," and the company directed the conductor to assume the title of "Doctor," his visiting cards now reading "Doctor Nidd, accoucheur-general to the C. P. R." —Algoma Gossip.

Cure for Insomnia.

Recently there came to work in a Brookfield (Conn.) family a Swedish woman, who, hearing of a young woman's trouble from insomnia, told her of the practice of people in her country who are similarly afflicted. It was to take a napkin, dip it in ice-cold water, wring it slightly, and lay it across her eyes. The plan was followed and it worked like a charm. The first night the girl slept four hours without awakening, something she had not done for several months. At the end of that time the napkin had become dry. By wetting it again she at once went to sleep, and it required considerable force to rouse her in the morning.

Many a young man finds his courtship come to a full stop when it reaches the interrogation point.

The comedy in which Mr. William H. Crane will star next season is called "The Balloon," and is now running at the Strand Theatre in London.

THE DEADLY BOILER.

Five Men Killed and Eleven Injured by a Boiler Explosion.

A last (Thursday) night's Pittsburg despatch says: A boiler explosion occurred in Morris' foundry, on 23rd street, this city, to-day, killing a number of men and injuring others. The explosion occurred just after the noon whistle had sounded, and many of the workmen had left the works to get their dinners. The concussion shook buildings for several squares. In a few minutes a large crowd had gathered about the wreck, and the scene was most agonizing. Wives, mothers and children ran about crying and eagerly searching for their loved ones. The work of rescue is going on vigorously. Four are believed to be still buried beneath the debris, and it is found many more were caught in the wreck. The cause of the explosion has not been learned.

The building was a large, one-story brick structure. The plant was worth $20,000, and will prove a complete loss. Nothing remains but a mass of brick, mortar and timbers. The concussion shattered windows and damaged houses for three blocks around, and it is a miracle that more people were not killed or injured. The boilers were inspected six months ago and were thought to be in first-class condition. The real cause of the explosion will probably never be known.

The work of rescue was concluded late this afternoon, but no more bodies were found. All the employees have been accounted for. Of the 65 wor men five were killed and eleven injured, a number quite seriously. Stephen Carter, however, is the only one in a dangerous condition. He will probably die. The cause of the explosion is still a mystery. Some of the men say they heard the gauge tried a few minutes before the explosion and everything seemed all right. Every one agrees that the engineer was careful and competent. The boiler had been in the house eight years. The loss will reach $30,000.

A correct list of the killed and wounded is as follows: Killed—Gus Linneban, engineer, 25 years old, single; James Carter, boilermaker, 30, married; Jacob Rheinheimer, boilermaker, 28, married; Charles Aulenbache, boilermaker, 45, married; Daniel Clark, boilermaker, 30, single. Injured—Stephen Carter, skull fractured in two places, hand badly burned, will probably die; Martin Conner, painfully injured about the head and legs; Frank Manesky, boy, scalp wound and shoulder blade broken; Frank Smith, boy, injured about head and legs; James McColl, Wm. Kelly, Harvey Barr, Wm. Froner, Wm. Becker, James McKee, John Forest and B. F. Lea, all more or less cut and bruised, but not seriously hurt. Peter Lover, a boy, was buried underneath some timbers and was painfully injured about the head and legs, but will recover.

STARVING ONE'S SELF TO DEATH.

A Georgian Forger Thus Satisfies His Conscience in Twenty-six Days.

An Atlanta, Ga., despatch says: The death in Macon of John Adams, the cotton factor, whose forgeries foot nearly $60,000, has created a sensation. Since his incarceration in jail Adams refused all food. It was Friday night, Feb. 15th, when he was put in jail. He immediately resolved to die slowly by starvation that he might in part expiate his crime and sins. He never gave way to the cravings of hunger but once, and then it was only for a moment to eat two oranges and a piece of cake. This food his stomach could not retain, and so it cannot be said that the fast for starvation was broken during the twenty-six days of suffering and shame. The twenty-sixth day passed at 11 o'clock last night, and he entered the twenty-seventh in a deep and peaceful slumber. He was then at his home in Macon, having been taken there from the jail after a week's confinement. He was still in charge of the authorities, his family paying for a special guard that he might be at home. Since the first all efforts to induce him to eat have been fruitless. Upon her knees his aged mother begged him to save his life, but all entreaties were in vain. He begged his parents to allow nobody to force food or nourishment into his system, saying that this would only prolong his suffering. His courage was that of a martyr, most remarkable throughout. The authorities are universally condemned for allowing him to die this way. It is the general verdict that they were negligent in failing to force nourishment into Adams' stomach. Physicians declare that his life could have been prolonged a year or more in this way, and it is generally believed that had this method been resorted to he would have desisted in his efforts. While in jail he assigned to the Capitol Bank Life Insurance property amounting to $18 000. This is said to have been done in consideration of a promise not to prosecute him. Other creditors will fight the assignment and some startling disclosures are expected.

RESCUED FROM DEATH.

The Glad Deliverance of Five Miners Imprisoned in a Mine.

A Mount Carmel, Pa., despatch says: Five of the six miners at Black Diamond Colliery have been rescued alive and well, and the sixth will soon be brought to the surface. Hall and Revels, though suffering extremely from nervous exhaustion, gave to-night the first account of their experience. These two were driving near the shutes in breast No. 8, in the south slope of the mine, about noon yesterday, when they heard a terrific roar, and the next minute they experienced a shock which caused Hall to exclaim, "My God, Nick, the slope has caved in." Revels descended to the gangway, and 12 feet from it found their egress to the slope cut off by huge rocks. He called to the miners working in No. 7, and soon saw Pokus crawling from the debris. They both joined in the shouts, and then heard Hearshallsky calling from No. 7 chamber for help. He was pinioned by a large rock, and urged his comrades to come to his rescue. They climbed up a distance, but the danger grew so great that they had just time to run back when a second fall occurred, and no more sound was heard. The poor fellow was in all probability killed, though a force of men are still working for his deliverance. The five miners who were saved secured themselves by setting props in the gangway, and then awaited the result. They heard their rescuers stop work outside about 6 o'clock last night, and growing desperate they endeavored to climb up an abandoned chamber and gain an exit, but mountain-like boulders stood in their way. They returned to the gangway and endeavored to console one another. Later they heard sounds of outside work again, and their hope grew. They betook themselves to prayer, and the sounds grew nearer. They then signalled five times on the solid pillar. The rescuers returned the signal, and wives, children and hundreds of friends at the mouth of the colliery knew that five were safe. At 12 o'clock to day they heard a voice shouting, "Are all safe." The imprisoned miners answered back, "Five are here; one is covered." The next moment they embraced their rescuers, and shed tears of happiness. Their deliverance had been effected by driving a tunnel twenty-nine yards. Hundreds of tons of debris must be removed before the mine can be put in working order.

The Remarkable Sewing Machine of the Future.

There aren't many men in the world who can justly be called benefactors of womankind, but there are a few. Mr. Thomas A. Macauley, who is at the St. James, is one of them. During the last thirty years he has taken out over sixty patents on sewing machines—more than any other man. He is the Edison of that branch of human ingenuity.

"The sewing machine," said he, "is an evolution. But the great machine is not yet on the market, though it will soon be. The coming one will be on the lines of existing mechanism, but it will be lighter, have less parts, will do everything in embroidery that can be done by hand needles, and do it with infinite rapidity. It will be noiseless, can be run with one foot with the greatest ease, will adjust its tension automatically. Its parts will be so constructed that it will not clog with drying oil. In fact it will be as far ahead of the best machines of to-day as those are ahead of the clumsy attempt of a quarter century ago. It is merely a matter of simplification and adjustment.—Washington Post.

Poor Jones.

Mr. Jones had joined a French class, and was telling his wife how well he was getting along. "I am afraid," she said, "that it is nothing but a spasm. I've known people before who would tackle a foreign language, expecting to know all about it in a month, and by the time they could translate, 'The son of the baker has the loaf of bread of the daughter of the gardener,' or some such rank nonsense as that, and had bought a few dollars' worth of foreign books, their enthusiasm would die away like the morning mist." "But that's not the case with me," replied Mr. Jones, confidently; "I am progressing splendidly. Professor Crapaud says that in a short time I ought to begin to think in French, and when one can accomplish that progress is always rapid." "Well," said Mrs. Jones, with a sigh, "I don't want to interpose any objection, of course, and if you can learn to think in French I shall be glad of it. It's something you have never been able to do in English."

The Outraged Editor.

He in sanctum penetrated, and I looked up in surprise
From the proofs I was correcting, and he caught my angry eyes.
His appearance was against him, as he stood before the fire,
Of convivial complexion and irregular attire.
I insinuated, mildly, that I hadn't room for bores,
And that nothing was more precious than the time of editors.
Then he grimly smiled and nodded, with his head on an incline,
Asking if, 'mongst my contributors, was Imogene Vantyne.

I was startled; yes, and I'll confess that something like a blush
Came o'er my editorial cheek; and why my blood should rush
In such a way unusual, that at Imogene
Had been making an impression through her face I'd never seen,
For her poems were peculiar, and with passion were full charged;
And on reading them I'd found my little heart was much enlarged;
So, in one ecstatic moment, but a week before,
I had written her and had told her—loved her—yes, and more.

Then my visitor continued, that my charms were fair enough,
But this writer cared for business and not for gush and stuff;
That he thought it wasn't proper, and he hoped that I'd agree
To but raise the price of articles and let love matters be.
"Ah! then you must be her father, sir," I gasped, with loving rifle;
"Pray, then, say that I may visit her and woo her for my wife!"
How he laughed, as loud he shouted, "Why, she's no charming elf!
I just chose that for my nom-de-plume. I'm Imogene myself!"

It Wasn't Law.

"I remember riding home in a horse car with Henry W. Paine one day," remarked a story-teller, apropos of this eminent Maine jurist. "Paine was reading a sheep-skin-bound volume of law reports. 'This isn't law,' said Paine, 'it's only a collection of decisions of the Massachusetts Supreme Court.'"

There's a faint hint of spring
In the air;
There is mud under foot
Everywhere;
And objects (long hid by the beautiful snow),
Which we had forgot, are beginning to show
Here and there.

Old rubbers and shoes,
And snipets and chews,
Empty pint and quart bottles, no matter whose,
And no end of things we no longer can use——
And oh, oh, oh.

Here a whiff of old garbage beginning to blow,
And hark! there's the crocus beginning to crow——
Loud let us sing
Welcome to spring,
The time for uncovering every thing.

ONTARIO LEGISLATURE.

The following Bills were read the third time and passed:

To amend the Act respecting the federation of the University of Toronto and University College with other universities and colleges—Mr. Ross (Middlesex).

To incorporate the town of West Toronto Junction—Mr. Gilmour.

The following Bills were advanced a stage:

Respecting a certain by-law of the city of London—Mr. Meredith.

To enable the town of Cobourg to aid the Cobourg, Blairton & Marmora, or the Cobourg, Northumberland & Pacific Railway or other road—Mr. Field.

Respecting the consolidation of the debenture debt of the city of Toronto - Mr. E. F. Clarke (Toronto).

To revive and amend the Act incorporating the Sarnia & Lambton Southern Railway Company Mr. Graham.

Respecting the Toronto, Hamilton & Buffalo Railway Company—Mr. Leys.

Mr. Tooley moved that Sessional Papers No. 74 of the last session, being a return of copies of the evidence taken by Æmilius Irving, Esquire, Q C., with reference to the Ontario Grain and Seed Company, together with his report, be referred to the Printing Committee with instructions to consider the propriety of printing the same.

The motion passed.

The following Bills were introduced and read the first time:

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton)—To amend the Public Health Act; also, to amend the Liquor License Act.

The following Bills were read the third time and passed:

For enforcing orders under the Act respecting master and servant—The Attorney-General.

Respecting the powers of Electric Light Companies—The Attorney-General.

Mr. Gibson's (Hamilton) Bill to amend the Division Courts Act was read the second time.

The following Bills were advanced a stage:

Respecting a certain by-law of the city of London—Mr. Meredith.

To provide for the extension of the waterworks of the city of St. Catharines and for other purposes—Mr. Garson.

Respecting the Niagara & St. Catharines Street Railway Company—Mr. Garson.

Mr. Waters moved that in the opinion of this House the time has come when the Government of this Province should submit a measure for the approval of this Assembly having for its object the procuring of money from the capitalists of Great Britain upon the security of Provincial bonds or otherwise bearing interest at 3½ or 4 per cent. Said money to be advanced to the farmers of this Province to enable them to pay of existing mortgages at a very slight advance over first cost and not more than would cover the necessary expense of such loans; the farms to be the security for the money advanced, and the same to be repaid in such manner as may be devised. He explained how it was that a number of years ago settlers had borrowed money from loan companies with payments extending over twenty years, ostensibly at 6 per cent., but in reality at 11 per cent. Times were good then; wheat was selling at $1 to $1 25, and the farmers entered upon engagements which under the present conditions they were unable to meet. As a consequence many of them were losing their farms and leaving the country.

Mr. Ross (Huron) said that the object of the hon. gentleman was praiseworthy, but it would be only the revival of the municipal loan fund trouble. The object of the Government in lending money for drainage purposes was to encourage the improvement of the farms, but he doubted whether it would be advisable to encourage the farmers to go into debt, and the lowering of the rate of interest certainly would.

Mr. Blyth (Huron) opposed the motion. The matter would be too complicated and would get the Province into endless trouble. He thought the Government should accept the sinking fund money from the municipalities as a loan.

Mr. Gibson (Huron) opposed the motion.

Mr. Waters regretted that the Government had not promised to take the proposal into their serious consideration.

The motion was withdrawn.

Mr. Garson moved that in the opinion of this House it is expedient to extend to married women, possessed of the necessary propety or income qualification, the right of voting at municipal elections.

Mr Smith (York) seconded the motion.

The motion was withdrawn.

Mr. McMahon moved for a return of copies of any correspondence between the Ontario and Dominion Governments, or between the former and any corporation or persons, relating to the ownership, sale or lease of the Dundas & Waterloo macadamized road, together with copies of any papers in the possession of the Government relating thereto, subsequent to that already brought down in the year 1886.

The motion passed.

Mr. Dance moved that this House, recognizing that the High Schools and Collegiate Institutes of this Province have in the past proved of great service to education, and while not questioning the necessity of their being maintained in an efficient condition, is of opinion that the time has arrived when such schools should be more largely supported by fees, and that the law be so amended as to make it compulsory that fees should be charged to pupils attending such schools. He explained that he had brought the matter before the House for the purpose of having it discussed as he thought the time was ripe for such action. If not this session at least next session.

Mr. Ross (Middlesex) explained that the question of fees was increasing. Many of those who enter the schools did so for the purpose of qualifying themselves for the teaching profession. The Government would consider the matter and perhaps take action.

Mr. Metcalf considered that the imposition of fees would be a retrogressive step in public education. He believed the High Schools should be as free as the Public Schools.

Mr. Meredith said it would be unfair to compel High Schools that were willing to give free education to charge fees. At present the High Schools could charge fees if they wished. Many of the schools only charged fees to outsiders.

Mr. Wood supported the motion.

Mr. Gibson (Huron) wanted parish schools instituted like those in Scotland, where they taught the classics. He maintained that the High Schools should not receive any support from the Government. The High School in his district was twenty-five miles away from where he lived. It was no use to him.

Mr. Meredith—But the jail is seventy miles away from you.

Mr. Hardy—But that is not the point he is trying to get at.

Mr Gibson (Huron), continuing, said that he never knew of any person yet who had entered a High School to return to the farm. The money spent on High Schools would be much better spent in developing and building railways in the unsettled districts.

Dr. McLaughlin said he knew numbers of professional gentlemen who would never have occupied their present positions had it not been for free schools, free high schools and a free university. An hon. member had referred to Scotland. All he could say was at the time he visited Great Britain there was no chance of poor people rising. He believed in giving a perfectly free education, and would vote against such a scheme of imposing fees as that proposed. There was a growing disposition on the part of the farmers to give their sons and daughters a better education than had been the custom to give farmers' children. In Scotland it was not uncommon for university men to work farms.

Mr. Craig thought the people were very well satisfied with the present system. He was opposed to compulsory fees. He believed the teachers of the public schools were good teachers, and that their efficiency had been improving, a result owing to the high schools.

Mr. Dack thought that in Bruce the feeling was in favor of compulsory fees, and of increasing the grants of public schools, and the establishment of a fifth form.

The motion was withdrawn.

Hon. G. W. Ross introduced a Bill to amend the Free Libraries Act, which was read the first time.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the Bill to amend the Anatomy Act, which provoked a long discussion, the usual objections being raised to the proposal to permit bodies to be taken for dissection unless claimed by relatives within 24 hours after death.

Mr. Meredith said that it would be a shame if the Legislature of a civilized Province like Ontario passed such legislation.

Mr. Fraser also opposed these clauses, and proposed amendments which were acceptable.

Mr. Waters suggested that as there were at present six Bills before the House dealing with the assessment law, it was too late in the session to give them all proper consideration, and he thought it as well to let them lie over until next session, and for the Government to bring down a measure next session.

Mr. Mowat said that he concurred in this opinion, but suggested that two of the Bills be taken up and referred to the Municipal Committee.

Mr. Wood (Hastings) withdrew his Bill to amend the Registry Act. He said that the Legal Committee had completely changed the spirit and intention of the Bill, and he could not accept it.

The following Bills were read the third time and passed:

Respecting the Ontario & Sault Ste. Marie Water, Light and Power Company and the town of Sault Ste. Marie—Mr. Lyon.

For the better protection of insectivorous and other birds—Mr. Clarke (Wellington)

Mr. Mowat moved that when this House adjourns on Tuesday next, it do stand adjourned until 11 of the clock on Wednesday next, and that each day for the remainder of the session the House do stand adjourned until 11 of the clock in the forenoon of the following day, Mr. Speaker to leave the chair each day at 1 until 3 o'clock, without the question being put. The motion passed.

Mr. McAndrew introduced a Bill to amend the Act respecting the office of sheriff.

The following Bills were read the third time and passed:

Respecting the consolidation of the debenture debt of the city of Toronto.—Mr. E. F. Clarke, Toronto.

To amend the Pharmacy Act.—Mr. Gibson, Hamilton.

Respecting the Niagara & St. Catharines Street Railway Company.—Mr. Garson.

Respecting the Boards of the Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec.—Mr. Dryden.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the Attorney-General's Bill respecting the administration of justice in certain cases. This Bill contained a clause making it permissible to appoint an assistant Police Magistrate on a majority vote of the Municipal Councils.

Mr. Meredith objected to a bare majority of the Council passing on the matter, and proposed an amendment to the effect that it would require a two-third vote of the Council present to pass such a resolution

Mr Mowat said the clause dealt principally with the city of Toronto, and asked for Mr. E. F. Clarke's opinion on the clause.

Mr. E. F. Clarke said the city had not passed on the advisability of appointing an assistant magistrate yet, but he thought perhaps it would be as well to amend the clause as suggested by Mr. Meredith.

Mr. Mowat consented and the amendment was adopted.

Mr. Gibson's (Hamilton) Bill to amend the Division Courts Act was passed through Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Meredith objected to clause 21, which authorized the summoning for debt, and the garnishee of their salaries, in the cases of young unmarried men, irrespective of the extent of their salaries. He said that in many of these cases a summons for debt would mean a dismissal by the employer. Tradesmen ought to be taught not to encourage these young men to take credit.

Mr. Hardy thought the young men ought to be taught not to run into debt.

The clause passed.

The committee rose and reported progress.

The debate on the motion for going into Committee of Supply, and Mr. Meredith's amendment thereto condemning the liquor license administration, was resumed.

Mr. Wylie said the Government control of the license boards worked injuriously in cases of close election contests. Partisan influence was said to be exerted in these instances. At his own election he found it difficult to get Conservative hotel-keepers to promise him either their votes or support, so apprehensive were they of disastrous results to themselves. He did not believe the same abuses would occur if the County Councils were again given control of the license boards.

Mr. McLaughlin challenged the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Willoughby) to formulate his charges so that an investigation might be held. As to the retrogressive change proposed by the Opposition, the whole temperance and church sentiment of the country was opposed to it.

Mr. Awrey said that the hotel-keepers were the supporters of Dr. Willoughby in East Northumberland. His agents were hotel-keepers, and it was very amusing to see him call his supporters martyrs to the liquor license laws.

Mr. Awrey continued the debate. He taunted the Opposition with making vague charges in wholesale which they could not substantiate. For fourteen years in his riding there had not been a complaint against the administration of the Crooks Act.

Mr. Clancy said that the administration of the Crooks Act and the Scott Act by the Government had brought both into contempt. The principle contended for by the Opposition was that it was not possible to administer the Liquor License Act in an honest manner if the Government—any Government—had control of the license boards.

Mr. Ballantyne contended that the Crooks Act had been admirably administered. Under the previous system inspection of liquor places was a farce, everybody who applied got a license, and liquor was sold at all hours. As to the Scott Act it was impossible to enforce it because the people did not sympathize with the measure.

The House divided and the amendment was lost. Yeas 23, nays 43.

YEAS—Messrs Blyth, Clancy, Clarke, E. F. (Toronto), Clarke, H. E. (Toronto), Craig, Creighton, Hammell, Hudson, Ingram, Kerns, Lees, Meacham, Meredith, Monk, Morgan, Preston, Rorke, Smith (Frontenac), Stewart, Tooley, Whitney, Willoughby, Wood (Hastings) —23.

NAYS — Messrs. The House then went into Committee of Supply and passed several items of the estimates.

Mr. Meredith asked if there was any truth in the rumor that the Government had changed its policy on the railway question.

Mr. Mowat said the Government policy would be found in the notice of motion given by Mr. A. M. Ross.

Peter Nearshalsky, after fifty hours' imprisonment in the Black Diamond Colliery, near Mount Carmel, Pa., was hoisted to the surface at 4 o'clock on Saturday afternoon. His appearance was the signal for cheers from thousands of throats, which were heard for miles. She was found between the front trucks and the driving wheels of the engine. She was only slightly injured. Only for the depot detective signalling the engineer she would have been killed.

DISCOLORED JEWELLERY.

Sometimes the Gold, Sometimes the Wearer Causes It.

Sometimes it is the gold and sometimes the girl that makes jewellery crock, as is evidenced by the following from the Jewellers' Weekly:

Shortly after the holidays there came into my place a pleasant-mannered young man who expressed a desire to look at some gold necklaces. It is needless to say that I sold him one. It was fourteen carats and very pretty. Two days later the door was flung open and in rushed the same young man, boiling with rage. He threw the necklace on the counter, demanding the return of his money, and threatened to expose me as a swindler. It took half an hour to learn his story. It seems that after presenting the necklace to his lady love he had taken her to a reception ornamented with his present. After the first dance there was a commotion in one corner of the room, and the rivals of our customer's best girl were tittering among themselves and whispering about her. The young lady looked in the glass and almost fainted at the sight. Her beautiful neck was almost black from the friction of the necklace. She changed her mind about fainting, returned home with her brother, and sent the necklace back to her young man with a note that she did not like the brass. I tested the necklace in his presence, and proved to him that it was full 14 carats. About that time a young physician called to purchase a scarf-pin. He had overheard part of the story and asked to hear the balance, as he believed he could throw some light on the subject. Pretty soon he laughed outright and said: "Why, sir, the trouble is with your girl and not the necklace. She has too much sulphur, iron, mercury, salt or acid in her blood, and as any of these substances has an affinity for gold the explanation is clear. I have patients for whom mercurial medicines have been prescribed, and the result is that their fingers upon which rings are worn discolor at once." My customer cooled off and carried his purchase away.

Time Evens Things up.

Plumber (1889)—"Where are you going?"

Wife—"To sell my diamond necklace. We must have bread."

Householder (next door)—"Where are you going?"

Wife—"To look at a diamond necklace which, I hear, is for sale cheap."

Householder—"Well, the pipes haven't frozen once this winter If you like it buy it."

A Blunt Conclusion

A Dialogue.

Who is that young man with a moustache going up the street with the papers in his pocket, Pa ?

That is W. J. Bellamy, the Conveyancer, Insurance and Loan Agent, my son.

Where does he live, Pa ?

In Flesherton, above Dr. Christoe's dwelling, my son.

Is he a nice man, Pa ?

Yes my son he is a very nice, courteous man.

How do you know, Pa ?

Well my son I have had him to do a good deal of business for me and have proved him such.

If you were selling your farm, or getting your buildings insured, or wanted to borrow money, to whom would you go to get the business done, Pa ?

To Mr. Bellamy, my son.

Why, Pa ?

Because my son he has had a large experience in the business, and I should feel sure that it would be done right.

Where does Bellamy get all the money he lends, Pa ?

From the North of Scotland Mortgage Co., my son.

Where does the North of Scotland live, Pa ?

Do not ask me so many questions my son You will drive me crazy.

How long does it take to learn to be a conveyancer, Pa ?

About one month, my son.

But to be a good conveyancer, Pa?

Well my son, in order to know where to get cheap money, to do insurance properly, or to draw deeds, mortgages, leases, wills, &c., correctly, a man should be in the business from five to twenty years.

How long has Mr. Bellamy been in that line, Pa ?

About ten years, my son.

Have you any money, Pa ?

Not now my son, but I am going to borrow some through Mr. Bellamy. What do you want it for ?

I want to buy a North of Scotland, a Waterloo, or a Lancashire, or some of those companies from Mr. Bellamy. How much would they be, Pa ?

Do not ask me any more questions, my child.

Are you soon going home, Pa ?

Just as soon as I leave my application for a loan and insurance with Bellamy, my son.

THE JESUIT ESTATES BILL.

Yeas 13, nays 188.

That is the way the vote stood on Col. O'Brien's motion Friday morning last upon the Jesuit Bill. The motion read as follows:

That an address be presented to the Governor-General, setting forth that this House regards the power of disallowing the Acts of legislation of the Legislative Assemblies of the Provinces, vested in his Excellency in Council as a prerogative essential to the existence of the Dominion.

That this great power, which should never be wantonly exercised, should be fearlessly used for the protection of the fundamental principles of the constitution and for the safeguarding the general interests of the people

That in the opinion of this House the passage of the bill by Legislature of the Province of Quebec, entitled an Act respecting the settlement of the Jesuits' Estates, is beyond the power of that Legislature:

Firstly, Because in endows from public funds a religious organization thereby violating the unwritten, but undoubted, constitutional principles of the complete seperation of Church and State, and of absolute equality of all denominations before the law.

Secondly, Because it recognizes the usurpation of a right by a foreign authority, namely, his Holiness the Pope of Rome, in declaring his consent necessary to empower the Provincial Legislature to dispose of a portion of the public domain, and also because the Act being made to depend on the will, and the appropriation of the grant thereby made is subject to the control of the same authority; and

Thirdly, Because the society of Jesus is a secret and politico-religious body, the expulsion of which from every Christian community wherein it has had a footing was rendered necessary by its intolerant and michievous intermeddling with the functions of the civil government; and, therefore, this House prays that his Excellency will be graciously pleased to disallow the Act.

For three days the matter was under discussion by the most eloquent talent in the House, and the result is that our astute politicians of both parties have seen fit to uphold the Government in its refusal to call upon the Governor-General to disallow the Jesuit Bill. A paltry eight Conservatives and five Reformers supported Col O'Brien's motion. Sir John McDonald in his speech said: "There are at the present time in the Dominion of Canada 71 Jesuits. Are they going to convert the whole of Canada? Are the youth of the Dominion to be seduced by the 71 Jesuit priests? They are armed with a string of beads, and sashes around their waist, and with a mass book or missal. What harm can they do?" What harm can they do? The answer has been given by the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada themselves in this instance. This insignificant 71 can lay a spurious claim to public property and receive an acknowledgement therefor of nearly half a million dollars, while the protestant portion of Quebec receive $60,000—for what purpose? If the Jesuits had any moral, legal or any other claim upon this property why was it divided with the protestants? The fact of this bill having been allowed does not quite demonstrate to our satisfaction the inability of this innocent 71 to do harm. They are sufficiently powerful at all events to set the whole country by the ears, and to demonstrate the fact that they can, if need be, command the will of both our great political parties. Their ability lies not in their own numerical strength, but in the moral support of the papal sinews behind them. The Government admit that it was within their power to veto this bill, and yet they did not care to do so, while the opposition did not care to censure the Government for not doing so. The cause for this union of political sentiment is patent to all. The farce has been played, let the curtain drop upon the scene. But it may rise again upon another act and the drama proceed until the innocent 71 are forced to seek refuge in some foreign country where their "innocence" can be appreciated. History is but repeating itself here, and the argument that the Jesuit of to-day is not the Jesuit of a hundred and fifty years ago is negatived by the fact, patent to every one, that their strife-fomenting qualities and insinuating aggressiveness have, in the light of recent events, undergone no change

The members who voted for disallowance were Messrs. Barron, Bell, Charlton, Cockburn, Denison, Mcdonald (Huron), McCarthy, McNeil, O'Brien, Scriver, Sutherland, Wallace, Tyrwhitt.—Total, 13.

The American people have met with a terrible catastrophe. Their war fleet, consisting of three war vessels, has been annihilated in Samoan waters by a cyclone.

At a convention of Reformers held in Durham on Thursday last, J. H. Hunter was selected as their standard bearer for the next local contest. There was but one nomination.

The city of Toronto has a bill before the House by which it is empowered to compel the telegraph, telephone and electric light companies to place their wires underground. The bill will receive much opposition.

The past week has witnessed the passing away of another great English statesman. John Bright was the orator of the masses. Although not a college bred statseman, his power of oratory was such that he could move an audience even more powerfully than Mr. Gladstone himself. Mr. Bright represented Birmingham in the British Parliment. He was born in 1811, and entered political life just 50 years ago. His remains were interred on Saturday at Rochdale.

To the Editor of The Advance.

SIR,—In your last week's issue your station reporter stated that his business would take him out to the country for the next few weeks. For my part I am sorry to hear that your reporter has ceased to correspond to your valuable paper, as his items throughout the winter season as dished out to the readers of The Advance were fresh and lumpy. He struck from the shoulder every time, and always covered a point. They had a grand moral effect on the citizens of our Burgh. But I am of the opinion that your reporter is a permanent resident of the station (house.) But I hope he will soon return from the country and take up the gauntlet again, as the items of the station were always interesting. I would just say he has steered his bark well, as it is not known for a positive fact who your reporter is. But there has been a good deal of surmising. Hoping we will hear from him again soon, I remain yours, J. A.

ESTELLE'S INFATUATION:

A NOVEL.

CHAPTER VI.

SPREADING THE NET.

If Mrs. Aspline's dinner had been successful in its pleasure-giving power so was that at the Dower House, which was larger and more inclusive. It took in all the former guests and some half dozen more, among whom where Mr. and Mrs. Clanricarde. Estelle would not go. She had been asked, of course, but in her self-elected state of quasi-widowhood she had preferred the solitude of home, where she might think of her distant and ever-adored Charlie, and carry her renunciation as so much sacrifice to the memory of their interrupted love. And as Mrs. Clanricarde was only cruel when the "sacra fames" was gnawing too fiercely at her vitals, she let her daughter indulge her somewhat wayward humor and forego the dinner, which perhaps, the mother reasoned, a girl could not be expected to enjoy. Had it been a dance, she might have insisted; but a dinner to a girl who prefers bread and butter to anything else, and calls "a la Soubise" onion sauce—that was of the nature of pearls cast before swine; and Mrs. Clanricarde disapproved of waste.

For herself, she went to the Dower House as a matter of duty; so she said. It was only right to cultivate neighborly feelings, and to help the Kingshouses when they took the trouble of entertaining such people as the Asplines. She had heard—who had not?—of this new rich man who had suddenly descended as if from the skies on the Asplines—like Job in that shower of gold which neither ancient nor modern Danaes can resist. As yet she had not seen him. She was not on visiting terms with the Asplines—she wished now that she had been—Anthony had not shown at church as a good citizen and sound Churchman should have done; and the weather had been too bad for walking out.

With the secret determination to fascinate this new-comer, whom yet she spoke of with not so much judicious reserve as prepared hostility, Mrs. Clanricarde dressed herself with more than ordinary care—and she was never negligent of her appearance. The result justified the means. She looked superb, and she knew it. She had that indescribable chic, that look of foreign distinction, which no daughter of Albion can imitate.

"How handsome you look to-night, Louise!" said that unlucky George, seeking to propitiate his tart tempered goddess, as well as sincerely stirred to unwonted admiration.

He laid his hand on her white, plump arm with a caressing, half-timid touch.

"It is a wonder that I have any looks at all after your conduct," was her cold reply, drawing away.

At dinner Mrs. Clanricarde was seated next to Anthony Harford; and on her, as on every one, his wonderful manner of reserve and dignity made the sharp impression of a new experience. That odd combination of the wild West "scout" with the English gentleman gave him a flavor as of cultivated wild fruit. And he, though seated next to Lady Kingshouse, was not unwilling to divide himself between the two. The vivacity of this striking-looking woman, with her dark bright eyes and prematurely white hair dressed a la Pompadour, amused and interested him. He did not know, but he half believed, that he was in love with Lady Elizabeth. For all that, he was not sure, for he felt for her differently from what he had ever felt for any woman in his life before; and he was not quite able to analyze his own sensations. Nor did he know her mind. She was sweet and friendly and gracious as a wingless angel might be. But how about the woman? He fancied that her cheeks had taken a deeper color when he came upon her suddenly in the lane; that her eyes looked both brighter and softer when they met his; that, when he entered the room this evening, that inner kind of smile which tells of secret pleasure had come over her face like so much sunlight. He fancied all this; he did not know. The reserve of a modest English girl makes divination difficult. Anthony was no fop, and he was afraid to think that these shadowy signs meant more than so many accidents with which he had really no vital connection. And how beautiful she looked to-night! Not with the beauty which stirs a man's senses or mounts like strong wine to his brain, but with the beauty that calms while it inspires, that brings the glory of heaven down to the earth for sweet sustenance and illumination. Anthony thought her again and again the loveliest lady he had ever seen, and wondered with increasing wistfulness what she thought of him, and whether she liked him below the surface, and not only just upon it.

Thus the dinner passed.

When the gentlemen came into the drawing-room, Anthony went straight to where Lady Elizabeth and Mrs. Clanricarde were sitting together, discussing Shakspeare and the musical glasses with apparent interest and real flatness—Lady Elizabeth thinking of Anthony Harford with pleasure, Mrs. Clanricarde with unrest. As he joined them, what was dark to Anthony was clear as daylight to Mrs. Clanricarde, and she read in a glance what he had not spelt correctly after long looking.

"She is in love with him," thought Estelle's mother; "and I will conquer."

Something stirred her as if it had been a sword drawn from its scabbard. The passion of the fight, love of intrigue, desire of conquest, all leaping up in a sudden flame in her heart. Born for the kind of warfare as she was, how seldom had her talents been utilized here in this old Sleepy Hollow—this Noah's ark kind of society! But now had come the hour—and the man; and Mrs. Clanricarde consecrated herself to the struggle as fervently as ever a young squire consecrated himself to the laws of his new knighthood.

"Will you come and see me, Mr. Harford?" she said, in her blandest way. "I have a few old Japanese curios that are very rare. They are fine, are they not, dear?" to Lady Elizabeth.

"Beautiful!" answered that guileless Aslauga. "Quite worth seeing," she added.

"Thank you. I will go with pleasure," said Anthony.

He had not the faintest notion who Mrs. Clanricarde was, nor where she lived, but Delight would tell him, and perhaps accompany him. She was a very amusing and vivacious lady—that was all he knew and all he cared for at the present moment.

"When will you come?—to-morrow?" she asked. "How long do you stay at Hindfleet? Perhaps, in any case, you had better come to-morrow."

"Yes, I will call on you to-morrow," he answered. "I am not staying many days longer. I have outstaid my time as it is."

"I am sure you will admire my curios," she repeated.

"I am coming for you, not for your old relics," he said, bluntly.

And Mrs. Clanricarde's heart gave a throb like a girl's. If this stranger were so easily charmed with her, what would he be with Estelle? And what a splendid-looking creature he was! really a conqueror among heroes! How far had he gone with Lady Elizabeth? Not very far, she thought. She was as astute as any human being could be, not to have more than the normal senses, and she did not see any indications of an express understanding between them.

"Oh!" said Mrs. Aspline, with the briskness of a sour ferment, when he told her of his engagement; "that's in the wind, is it?"

"What's in what wind?" he asked.

"Well, you have fallen into the hands of the Philistines, that's all," she answered. "This Mrs. Clanricarde is the best manœuvring woman in Kingshouse. She is like a spider with flies. You are done for, Anthony, if you do not see through her."

He laughed.

"I am not afraid of her," he said, lightly.

"It would be better if you were," said Mrs. Aspline, sharply. "Pride goes before a fall, Anthony, and you are not the first man who has fallen into a trap."

"Don't see the trap," he returned.

"And I do," said Cookey, with a certain viciousness by no means usual to her.

"And then she is so proud," said Anne, languidly; "and what of, I should like to know? They are ruined, and every one expects to hear of their being sold up—any day. Why should they be proud?"

"Then you too don't like them?" asked Anthony.

"I? Like them?" she answered, quite quietly. "I seldom dislike any one—do I, mother? But if there is one person in the world that I hate, it is Mrs. Clanricarde. I wish she was dead!"

Anthony looked at her in amazement.

"What queer cusses women are!" he thought to himself.

What was the meaning of all this? What corn of poor, fat, good-natured Cookey's had this quasi-Bostonian trodden on? Where had sleepy, stupid, unpractical little Anne been pinched? What tempest in a teapot had shaken these atoms into antagonism, and what was the solution of the mystery?

All that, however, was their affair. He had nothing to do with it. As a gentleman he must keep his promise to this vivacious French-marquise-like woman.

CHAPTER VII.

HIS FATE.

The next day Anthony prepared to go to Les Saules, as agreed on. Mrs. Aspline had evidently forgotten the engagement, for she proposed that her guest should drive with her and Anne to see the Fairy Hawk, which was one of the "points" of the place, and which would be so lovely to-day! There had been a two days' sharp frost, and the icicles would be now beautiful—really something worth seeing.

"You will come, of course?" she said, with a flushed face and rather quick voice.

"Where is your Hawk?" asked Anthony. "In what direction?

"Through Kingshouse, and on the Lancaster Road."

"Anywhere near Les Saules?"

"Les Saules!" Mrs. Aspline spoke in a tone of surprise. "Oh dear no! What have we to do with Les Saules?"

"Well, I have, if you have not," he returned. "I am going to see Mrs. Clanricarde to-day."

"Oh!" said Mrs. Aspline, crisping her lips. "So you persist, do you?"

"Persist in keeping an appointment?" he laughed. "Why, of course, I do."

"Then you'll repent it," said Mrs. Aspline, turning coldly away, as one turns from a son of perdition finally abandoned to his evil ways.

It was all very inexplicable to Anthony, and he exhausted conjecture in vain. He finally came to the conclusion that the vivacious half-foreign-looking woman was a runaway wife, whose little slip society had agreed to condone in a half-hearted way—strict sisters, like that virtuous and astute Cookey, holding aloof no matter who drew near. He was sorry to offend his hostess, but an engagement is an engagement; and Anthony was not the man to allow his actions to be influenced by any one, man or woman, and women no more than man. Meanwhile he would go round by the Dower House, and see that dear Delight, whose presence always brought him the sense of spiritual harmony and mental rest.

But Lady Elizabeth could not help him. All she could give him was the rather bald bit of information, "They do not like each other.'

"But why?" asked Anthony, who knew the fact and wanted the reason.

"I do not know, except that Mrs. Clanricarde did not call on the Asplines when they came," she answered.

"But why?" he asked again.

"Mrs. Clanricarde is very proud, and has great ideas of birth and all that," said Lady Elizabeth, reluctantly.

She did not like to allude to Mrs. Aspline's industrial origin to her friend and guest.

"Because she was once a cook?" said Anthony, bluntly, cutting the Gordian knot with one blow.

"Yes, I suppose so," was the answer.

The Americanized Englishman laughed.

"Good Heavens!" he said, with that kind of mirth which has in it more gall than honey. "As if it signifies a red cent whether she were a cook or not, if she knows how to behave herself, and bore a good character before and after! I should have thought that lady—Mrs. Clanricarde—had more sense than to stumble into this hole. Also," he added, looking at Lady Elizabeth, with eyes as soft as satin, "I should have thought that what Lady Elizabeth Inchbold patronized might pass muster with all the world besides in Kingshouse."

Lady Elizabeth smiled with the pretty faint embarrassment she so often showed when with Anthony Harford. Flattery, which from any one else was especially displeasing to her, from him was delightful.

"But there is nothing against either the one or the other?" he asked again. "My old friend Mrs. Aspline, I know, always conducted herself like a lamb. Has Mrs. Clanricarde as clean a record?"

"Quite," was the answer. "It is only a personal feeling. Perhaps, as mothers, they are as mutually jealous of their daughters."

"Daughters? Has Mrs. Clanricarde a daughter?"

"Yes; Estelle; a very pretty girl, and a very dear one."

Lady Elizabeth spoke warmly. She dearly loved Estelle—and she pitied her as much as she loved—which gave a certain flavor of tenderness exquisitely charming.

"Why did she not come here yesterday?" was Anthony's next query.

"She is not very well," answered Lady Elizabeth. She did not say, "She is broken-hearted because her lover has gone away."

"Oh! now I see it all," cried Anthony, with sudden illumination. "Why, of course. How dense of me not to have seen it before! Jealousy. There it is. Well you women do beat creation for that!" he added. "You are jealous among yourselves, and that's a fact! We men are nowhere compared to you."

"I think you do pretty well, however, in that line," was Lady Elizabeth's laughing reply; but Anthony, with emphasis, repeated his assertion, and declared that women were the most jealous beings on earth, and beat all creation hollow, let what else would make the running.

Then he arose to leave, and holding Lady Elizabeth's hand just a moment longer than necessary, he said, looking at her again with his satiny eyes, "But you are above that trash, I am sure! I should as soon expect lightning from a rainbow as jealousy from Lady Elizabeth!"

"I hope I should never be so poor-hearted or mean spirited," was her answer, made gravely and with earnestness.

"The loveliest lady in England" was Anthony's unspoken thought, repeated two or three times, as he went on his way to Les Saules—"just the loveliest! She has a heart as pure as crystal and a mind as bright as silver. I wonder if she could ever be brought to love me? She is worth trying for. With such a wife as that all my unrest would be over—all my fever would be quieted

He turned into the gate of Les Saules, and soon found himself in the room where Mrs. Clanricarde was alone.

She received him graciously, with just that amount of cordiality which keeps on the right side of gush, and is as far from niggardliness as from excess. She said she was glad to see him, and she did not ask after his hostesses. She spoke of the pleasant dinner they had had yesterday evening, and called Lady Elizabeth a dear soul. But she greatly lamented her want of practicality.

"In what way is she unpractical?" asked Anthony, feeling as if his lance were in rest and the bugle had sounded.

"She is too good," returned Mrs. Clanricarde, with a soft smile. "As if any one can be too good! I suppose I ought to say that we are all too bad for her." She said this with the nicest little air of apology and self-accusation. She was really a wonderfully charming woman!

"To be too good is not a very general fault," said Anthony, answering her smile. "For me, I think Lady Elizabeth just perfect."

"She is indeed delightful," returned Mrs. Clanricarde. "It is a pity she belongs to such a family."

"What of them?" he asked, gravely.

"Do you not know?—there is madness among them," she answered. "Some of them are now, I believe, in a lunatic asylum. It is that which makes me regret the dear love's decided eccentricity as I do. If her family history was not darkened by this terrible scourge, she might be as odd she as liked, and one would only love her all the more, and say it was her way, and, being hers, beautiful! But now come and look at my curios, Mr. Harford. I have really a very notable collection."

She had, however, taken the heart out of him for the moment, and he could think of nothing but the terrible shadow on the path of his sweet friend. And for a while Mrs. Clanricarde thought she had made a mistake and done more harm than good by her false information. She recovered her lost ground with infinite pains, and only after a time. Her vivacity was infectious, and Anthony could not resist the contagion. He handled her queer little squat figures and dislocated monsters with wry necks and shaven heads, pronounced them interesting and thought them hideous.

Then, as Anthony, having exhausted the outside world as represented here in the drawing-room at Les Saules, was beginning to take leave, she stopped him by saying, as a kind of after-thought—a kind of minor and even minus attraction—"Oh, by-the-way, I must introduce you to my daughter before you go. She is upstairs, painting. She is so fond of art!—and is really not a very despicable artist; at least, naturally, I think so."

"Oh yes! your daughter. I should like to see Miss Clanricarde," said Anthony, who had forgotten her existence.

Mrs. Clanricarde rang the bell and asked the servant to beg Miss Clanricarde to come down.

In a few minutes the door-handle turned and the door opened. Framed as in a picture—checked by the momentary surprise of finding a stranger where she expected to see only her mother—Anthony saw a tall dark-haired girl, with soft brown eyes and a pale flower-like face, dressed in a quaintly fashioned gown of clinging material and indeterminate color—neither blue nor green, but between both; a girl whose beauty was great, but whose charm was greater—that subtle, nameless charm which belongs to the fated and fateful women of men's passion and destruction; the charm which Helen and Cleopatra and Mary Stuart had to their sorrow, and the sorrow of those who loved them. Her eyes were worlds in which the soul was lost. Her smile was a net wherein the senses were entangled. Her dark and curling hair was like the perfumed tendrils of a dusky vine. Her lithe and graceful figure had in it the sense of melody and rhythmic harmonies in every line and every gesture. She stood there as she might have been the blessed damozel against the golden bar of heaven; and Anthony caught his breath as at a vision seen in the twilight. He felt as if the whole meaning of his life had suddenly been made clear, as if he had looked into a magic crystal and seen the hidden secrets of fate and the future.

In the brief moment while Estelle stood there and he looked at her, he seemed to live years, and to go through the experience of a lifetime. Something woke up in him that had been dormant for all his life, and he came suddenly to the possession as of another sense, to the full inheritance of his soul. Then the spell shifted, it did not break, as Estelle, letting the door fall from her hand, came slowly into the room and was formally introduced. And Anthony, who had adopted the American habit of shaking hands on an introduction, was afflicted with a sudden, and to himself an incomprehensible shyness, and felt as if he dared not touch that long white graceful hand, no more than an ordinary knight dared have touched the San Graal had he seen it.

After this he lost count of time. He could never remember how long he stayed, nor how he tore himself away. He only knew that he found himself at last at Hindfleet, in his heart, as it were, a bird singing, a fountain playing, a garden blooming, and the dull winter evening changed to an infinite glory of great gladness which yet was akin to tears.

CHAPTER VIII.

AT THE KINGSHOUSE ARMS.

The position was undoubtedly awkward. Anthony Harford was the guest of Mrs. Aspline, who hated the Clanricardes, and irresistibly attracted by the Clanricardes, who did not visit the Asplines. What was to be done? Anthony would not leave Kingshouse just yet, and he could not stay at Hindfleet if he intended to improve his acquaintance with the Clanricardes, as he certainly would. For what else should he remain here at all? Even Lady Elizabeth, sweet as she was and delightful as he had found her—just on the brink, too, as he had been; just on the brink, looking for her face in the magic fountain—even she could not have kept him; nor could her people, nor could his present hostess. But that tall dark-haired girl, with her fated charm—ah! that was another matter. To see her again and often—to get to know her and to prove her—to win her to himself, and wear her on his heart for all his life, as his flower of love and jewel of his treasury—yes, for Estelle he must stay and could not go. And yet he could not stay at Hindfleet.

Wherefore, making so far a clean breast of it, he told Mrs. Aspline what was on his mind as relating to her and "those people at Lissols," as she called them; and how impossible he felt it to accept her hospitality while using his time in visiting a house which was shut against her, and which now she would not visit were it opened to her.

"I am sorry for you, Anthony," said Mrs. Aspline, flushing a violent crimson passing into purple. "You are the first man that manœuvring old cat has caught and you will not be the last. I thought you had more sense. You are old enough, I am sure!"

"Old enough to know my own mind?" said Anthony, gravely. "I hope so."

"When you say the Clanricardes, you mean Miss," continued Mrs. Aspline. "I do not suppose you care much for that fool of a man who is next thing to a natural, or for Mrs. Clanricarde either, with her pride and her finery. At her age dressing as she does to look like a picture! I have no patience with such vanity! It is not decent; and so I tell you."

Anthony was silent. It did not come into the programme of his duty, as he conceived it, to defend Mrs. Clanricarde's millinery; but he thought again, as so often before, "What queer cusses women are when they come to loggerheads among themselves!"

"Take our advice," said Anne, putting on a little maternal air that was both becoming and entertaining; "go home to Thrift, and keep out of danger. You will repent it if you stay here. We know all about these people better than you do."

"I do not suppose there is much harm to know of them," said Anthony, even graver than before. "Well, I don't know what you call harm," said Mrs. Aspline. "If right and left, and Tom, Dick, and Harry's no harm, then there is none, I suppose. But I know I would have been sorry enough if any daughter of mine had been hawked about all over the place, as Mrs. Clanricarde has hawked hers!"

Anthony's bronzed face became strangely livid, as well as stern. It seemed to suddenly set like so much metal, and to become rigid like death.

"I reckon there's not much chance of hawking any girl about in such a God-forsaken old place as this," he said, with forced quietness.

"Then isn't there just!" returned Mrs. Aspline. "First that Mr. Charlie Osborne, who has a cough like a church-yard, and not a penny-piece to bless himself with; and then that moon-calf up at Redhill yonder, that Caleb Stagg, that I declare I would not touch with the end of a mop-stick. That woman there flung her daughter at these two, and would have given her ears for either. The way she went after that young Stagg was what I call a disgrace. And all the world knows it as well as I."

Anthony drew his lips close together, as people do when they are deeply moved, and yet wish to keep their self-command. Could he have ever liked this woman—this vulgar traducer of that exquisite vision? Mrs. Aspline took a new face and form and meaning for him. She was no longer the kind old Cookey of his boyish days, still less the improved, hospitable, almost lady-like woman of this latter time. She was a vulgar scold, and his heart sickened against her.

She saw that she had made a mistake.

"Well, there! I am wrong to put myself about like this," she said, with a forced laugh. "You are old enough to know your own mind, as you say, Anthony, and you have seen enough of the world by now to find your own way about. And I dare say I am prejudiced against this Mrs. Clanricarde and all her kith and kin."

"It is as well to know all sides," said Anthony, speaking with difficulty. "They stoned the saints once on a time, and they keep up the practice yet."

Mrs. Aspline flushed again, as before; Anne bit her lips; but both kept silent, and chewed the bitter cud with decorous resignation. It seemed little less than blasphemy to compare the Clanricardes—Estelle or her mother—to saints; but Anthony Harford was—well, he was a Harford, and the Harford mouth was hard.

"I reckon," he said after a moment's pause, "I shall be doing the square thing if I clear out of this and make new tracks. As I am going to see for myself what these ladies are like, and calculate to be pretty near half my time at Les Saules, it will be better for us all if I take rooms at the hotel, where I shall offend no one, and be in no one's way."

"That, of course, is as you like yourself," said Mrs. Aspline, with the dignity of displeasure. "You are not in our way here, Anthony, and I hope we have not shown that you were. I hope we have made you comfortable, and let you see that you were welcome. We have done our best."

Here the poor dear woman's voice a little broke, and her eyes grew red. The rain threatened after the thunder had growled.

"You have been just as kind as ever you could be," said Anthony. "There's nothing to be said on that, and I'm ever so much grateful to you. But I reckon it will be the squarest to clear out now, and most likely to keep us good friends."

"Very likely," said Mrs. Aspline, curiously lachrymose and indignant at one and the same time.

"Perhaps you are right," said Anne.

Vexed to see her mother so moved, she took a tone as hard and cold as an iron rod, as acid as so much lemon juice. For all her vague dreams, she had not dreamed herself in love with Anthony Harford.

"Then that is all fixed and straightened out," said Anthony, with a sense of relief.

"Certainly," said Mrs. Aspline; and "Certainly," echoed Anne.

Which ended the matter and clamped the proposition into its final affirmative. So that night saw Anthony Harford installed at Kingshouse Arms, where he intended to remain for at least some weeks.

He could not go back to Thrift! How cold and gloomy and desolate that fine old place looked in his memory!

Every one was glad to hear that Anthony Harford had moved into the town.

A curious little warmth spread over Lady Elizabeth's heart when she heard the news; and her fair face took the color of her feelings.

As for Anthony, had he been there he would no longer have noticed whether the fair cheeks flushed or paled, whether the soft eyes brightened or were abashed. These signs were signs to him no more.

"What can Harford be staying for at such a place as Kingshouse?" said my lord when he heard the news, like a man unable to see through a millstone.

"For society. I dare say his own place is dull," said my lady, like a woman having a reason always ready.

"I should not think the Kingshouse Arms a very lively lookout," he returned.

"But he has us, and that compensates."

"And he seems so much interested in astronomy," said Lady Elizabeth, with unconscious diplomacy.

"So he does," said her father; "and now that we have the frost again we will ask him to dinner, and we can make a night of it up aloft."

"You will freeze yourself to death some night up aloft," said the countess, just a point of querulousness—of quasi grumbling—mingled with what else was care and consideration.

"Oh, we have wraps and mufflers, as you know," was her husband's reply.

Both he and Lady Elizabeth were in riding costume.

"We will ride round by the town, and leave a message at the Arms," continued the earl. "I do not suppose he is engaged anywhere else."

"I should think not," said Lady Elizabeth, who was anxious he should be asked. "Why, to whom should he be engaged?" asked her mother in surprise. "Society is not so numerous here as to ask him every day to dinner."

"He might be at the Asplines," said her daughter.

"Or the Clanricardes," said the earl. "He seemed monstrously taken with Mrs. Clanricarde the other night; and upon my soul she looked uncommonly handsome! I never saw her look better. She might have been one of her own ancestors at the court of the Grand Monarque."

(To be Continued).

IS IT GENUINE?

Probably thousands of people in this section of country, and this section is no exception to any other in this respect in Canada, have read the report said to have been written by Prof. S. A. Lattimore, Ph. D., LL. D., Analyist of Foods and Medicines, New York State Board of Health, and Professor of Chemistry in the Rochester, N. Y., University, stating that all of the Safe Remedies manufactured by H. H. Warner & Co. were pure and wholesome, nor did any of them contain any mercury or deleterious substance. To shorten the controversy, however, we will give Prof. Lattimore's report entire:

UNIVERSITY OF ROCHESTER, CHEMICAL LABORATORY.

Mr. H. H. Warner has placed in my possession the formulæ of the several medicines manufactured and sold under the general designation of "Warner's Safe Remedies." I have investigated the processes of manufacture which are conducted with extreme care and according to the best methods. I have taken from the Laboratory samples of all the articles used in the preparation of these medicines, as well as the several medicines in which they enter. I have also purchased from different druggists in this city "Warner's Safe Remedies," and upon critical examination I find them all entirely free from mercury and from poisonous and deleterious substances.

We cannot think that a firm of the standing of H. H. Warner & Co. would dare publish such a statement if it were untrue, and we now have that firm's authority to say to our readers that it is absolutely and unqualifiedly true in every particular.

MARGARET LADY SANDHURST, who has been elected a member of the London County Council for Brixton, is a very remarkable County Councillor, with exceptional gifts, both social and magnetic, says the Pall Mall Gazette. Some of the feats of healing which she has been able to perform at her little hospital in northern London are almost incredible, were they not well authenticated.

THE IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

Lively Times in the House Over the Irish Commission.

PARNELL'S MANLY WORDS.

A last (Friday) night's London cable says: In the House of Commons to-day Sir William Vernon Harcourt, resuming the discussion regarding the Parnell Commission, declared that Attorney-General Webster's identification with the commission had destroyed the impression that the Government would be impartial and had added weight to the Times' charges. If the Attorney-General had not advised the Government Parliament should not vote a salary for services he had not performed. He condemned the Attorney-General's apology for the Pigott forgeries as mean, contemptible and disgraceful, and expressed the hope that he would make a better apology.

Attorney-General Webster replied that but for the duty he owed those who trusted him he would not have noticed the charges made by Sir William. If he were capable of the conduct imputed to him he would be a disgrace to the English bar. He was private counsel for the Times. It was immaterial whether he had been right or wrong in assuming that position, although it was doubtful whether he had been prudent.

Mr. Redmond's motion to reduce the Attorney-General's salary was rejected by 286 to 28.

Sir William Vernon Harcourt wanted to know whether the Attorney-General had the letter in which Pigott admitted his inability to stand cross-examination. If Mr. Soames had that letter and kept it from the knowledge of the Attorney-General the name of Mr. Soames ought to be struck off the rolls. The Attorney-General would doubtless now tell the House when he first learned of Pigott's character and whether he was informed when Houston burned Pigott's correspondence.

In the course of the Attorney-General's reply the Chairman called upon Xavier O'Brien to retire for interrupting. Mr. O'Brien denied that he opened his mouth. The Chairman repeating the order to retire, Mr. Pinkerton corroborated Mr. O Brien. T. P. O'Connor protested against the Chairman putting the lie to an honorable member without an inquiry. The Chairman accepted the disclaimer, adding that Mr. O'Brien could not deny having repeatedly interrupted loudly, and warning him not to repeat such conduct.

The Attorney-General continuing, declined absolutely to say whether he had advised the Government on any point. None knew better than Sir William Vernon Harcourt that he could not answer such a question, but he had never vouched to the Government for the authenticity of the letters. Harcourt ought to know that no counsel vouched for the truth of what he proposed to prove by evidence. Harcourt's argument that the counsel ought to satisfy himself of the accuracy of the statements that a witness would make was preposterous. He accused Harcourt of asking questions in this manner because he knew that a certain section of the press was only too glad to turn such questions into accusations. For instance, there was his question as to whether the Attorney-General suggested that Piggott should see Daly. He never heard of the visit till two nights ago. Regarding Pigott, the Attorney General argued that he had not the right to keep him from the witness-box because he said he could not stand cross-examination. He had informed the commission and put Pigott's letters in Sir Charles Russell's hands five days before Pigott went into the box. (Loud Ministerial cheers.) Would the committee believe that Sir Charles had asked that the letter should not be read till Pigott went into the box? (Laughter.) He protested strongly against Sir William's reference to Mr. Soames, who was not there to answer the charge. He assured the gentlemen opposite that all the charges made against him had failed to cause him any anxiety or a single sleepless night. If the further charges promised against him were no worse than they brought to-night, he was bound to confess that in his opinion the part he had played in the last few months would not be the least honorable portion of his career.

Messrs. O'Connor and Labouchere having spoken,

Mr. Parnell said he should not have intervened, but that in the language of Attorney-General Webster, and in the shouts of his supporters, there had been some faint echo of Lord Salisbury's equivocal language in respect to the forged letters. If Lord Salisbury still chose to pin the relic of his faith to the letters the consequence would be upon his head. In the witness box he (Parnell) had testified under oath that he had neither signed, written, authorized nor known of any of the letters, and Attorney-General Webster had not ventured to put to him a single question. Was there any member who would venture to express any doubt now that the letters were forgeries? Here there were loud cries for Mr. Fowler, who, Mr. O'Connor said, expressed doubts; but Mr. Fowler did not respond, whereupon Mr. O'Connor exclaimed, "He is a coward!" but he subsequently withdrew this expression at the request of the chair.

Mr James expressed satisfaction at the manner in which Attorney-General Webster had answered the charges.

Mr. Morley asserted that Sir Charles Russell had authorized him—(Conservative cries of "Where is he?")—to state that he was entirely in accord with the Opposition in the action that they were taking. He maintained that Attorney-General Webster had failed to answer the charges.

Mr. Gladstone, Sir Charles Russell and Messrs. Lockwood and Asquith were absent. Messrs. Soames and Walter were in the gallery. Six of the Parnellite counsel on the commission and several Liberals abstained from any part in the division.

A scene of great disorder followed. The Irish members rose in their places and cheered, and there were cries of "Pigott!" "Pigott!" "Remember Mitchellstown."

Secretary Balfour said he had suspended Captain Seagrave, but preferred not to dismiss him until documentary evidence of his guilt had been received.

Mr. Morley adduced a mass of details respecting witnesses for the Times with the view of disproving the Government's professions of neutrality. These details were mainly drawn from facts elicited by daily questioning in Parliament. Mr. Balfour professed that he had not followed the proceedings of the Parnell Commission with much interest. That was surprising. One would have expected that the Minister who fired the train would have curiosity enough to note the result of the explosion. In regard to the proposed vote of censure, it would be irrational to propose it now, because fresh disclosures were made daily. But it would come in good time.

Mr. Balfour, amid continued Opposition laughter, described the charge that the Government were connected with the Times through Houston and Pigott as a scandalous and unfounded libel. The Opposition, he said, revelled in libel, while affecting to regard it as the most shocking of crimes. They had charged Houston with having acted in complicity with Pigott; but they had declined to examine Houston when invited to do so. He thought it would be more decorous for the gentlemen opposite to refrain from comments sub judice. (Renewed laughter.) For asking how it was that witnesses were intimidated, Mr. Balfour was called to order by the Chairman. Continuing, he said the Government volunteered no information for the purpose of the commission, but they were willing to give it to either side when required.

Sir William Vernon Harcourt said Mr. Balfour misapprehended Mr. Morley's case. The fact that Irish constables had been subpœnaed did not make it necessary for them to remain for months in London, unless they were performing distinct services for the Times. The speaker raised a laugh by showing how the statements of Mr. Matthews and Mr. Balfour conflicted.

Mr. Bradlaugh said that so far from being impartial, the Government withheld from the persons accused matters material to their defence.

Mr. William Redmond (Nationalist) was called to order several times, and the Chairman finally warned him against further unseemly conduct.

Mr. Healy said he had tried to cross-examine Mr. Soames on his mode of getting up evidence, but the Times' chief ally, Justice Smith—

The Chairman, interrupting, called upon Mr. Healy to withdraw his reference to Her Majesty's judge.

Mr. Healy contended that he did not refer to the judge but to the commissioners, that the Commission Act simply called the commissioners by their names.

The Chairman nevertheless maintained that Mr. Healy was out of order.

Mr. Balfour, again rising to answer criticisms, taunted the Parnellites with allowing Pigott to escape, after he had confessed forgery.

Mr. T. P. O Connor was called to order for charging Lord Salisbury and Mr. Balfour with trying to galvanize the Parnell forgeries into life again.

An exciting scene ensued.

Mr. O'Connor twice refused to withdraw the remark as far as it concerned Lord Salisbury, amid the approving cries of his colleagues.

The Chairman appealed to the members on both sides to assist him in keeping order, but he did not further insist upon the withdrawal of Mr. O'Connor's remark.

Mr. O'Connor charged that the Times was equally guilty of allowing Pigott to go after he confessed forgery.

When the division was called Mr. Chamberlain crossed the House and sat chatting with Mr. Ritchie, a member of the Cabinet. His presence on the Ministerial side of the House called forth from the Opposition hilarious cries of, "At last in your proper place."

On the vote on Mr. Balfour's salary Mr. Morley severely criticized the Government's action in carrying on a "furtive clandestine battle behind its opponent's backs."

Mr. Bradlaugh moved that Mr. Balfour's salary be reduced by £500.

Mr. Bradlaugh's motion was rejected by 272 to 211.

A Ritualist Poet's Prophecy.

The following lines are from Neale's "Sequences, Hymns, Etc.," edition 1866 p. 131. They are striking in view of the trial of the Bishop of Lincoln. Why should Neale have selected Lincoln? It seems prophetic:

Again shall long processions sweep through Lincoln's mins er pile;
Again shall banner, cross and cope gleam thro the incense aisle;
And the faithful dead shall claim their part in the Church's thankful prayer,
And the daily sacrifice to God be duly offered there;
And Tierce, and Nones, and Matins shall have each their holy lay;
And the Angelus at Compline shall sweetly close the day.

LONGEVITY

Scientific men see no reason why the span of human life may not be extended to a round hundred years from the present limit of seventy to eighty years.

From Adam's time to that of Methuselah and Noah, men are recorded as attaining to well nigh the age of 1,000 years. The Psalmist David, however, says: "The days of our age are threescore years and ten; and though men be so strong that they come to fourscore years, yet is their strength then but labor and sorrow; so soon passeth it away, and we are gone."

This wide margin of longevity, together with proper observance of mental, moral and physical laws, leads investigators to believe it is possible that human life might be made to increase in length of days to a full century, at least.

Moderation and regularity in eating, drinking and sleeping are conducive to longevity, and those who observe proper habits and use pure and efficacious remedies when sick, may accomplish immense labor with no apparent injury to themselves and without foreshortening their lives.

Hon. H. H. Warner, President of the Rochester, N.Y., Chamber of Commerce, and manufacturer of the celebrated Warner's Safe Cure, has devoted much time and research to this subject of longevity, and has arrived at the satisfactory conclusion that life may be prolonged by rational and natural means. Thousands of persons are living to-day—enjoying the blessing of perfect health and vigor—who will testify to the almost magical efficacy of Warner's Safe Cure in restoring them to physical potency and to the normal type of constitution, after they had almost given up hope of life.

After middle age, many begin to lose their wonted vigor of body, and thereupon give way to inertness and useless repining. Yet all such have within reach that which both renews youth and contributes to the prolongation of life. Warner's marvellous Safe Cures are in every drug store, and are now regarded as standard specifics throughout the civilized world.

The strong desire to attain old age—meantime retaining the virile powers of body and mind—is necessarily connected with the respect paid to aged persons, for people would scarcely desire to be old, were the aged neglected or regarded with mere sufferance.

HER MAJESTY'S BOUNTY.

Pathetic Incident at Windsor—Red Tape Delays the Queen's Charity.

From the London edition of the N. Y. Herald.

A pathetic little incident, which shows how much red tape can entrammel even the charitable intentions of the Queen, occurred at Windsor on Friday afternoon.

Her Majesty was driving along Thames street with one of the Princesses, when she saw a blind man playing an accordeon, being led along the road by a woman. Touched by the gentle strains of his melody, Her Majesty's heart went forth in pity for the lot of the blind musician. Royal self-respect forbade her throwing a copper to the pair, as an humble civilian might have done; but by the time the regal equippage reached Windsor Bridge Her Majesty had contrived a scheme by which the pauper player's distress might be alleviated. This was the process:

At the Bridge the Queen stopped the carriage.

The Queen then summoned her attendant and handed him a two-shilling piece.

The Queen then gave him full instructions as to what he should do with it.

The attendant repeated the process with the toll-gate keeper.

The toll-gate keeper, whose name was Husted, received the florin and bowed.

The toll gate keeper then chased up the street after the beggar.

The toll gate keeper then told the beggar all about it.

The toll-gate keeper then told the woman leading the beggar.

The toll-gate keeper then gave the beggar the two shilling piece.

The toll-gate keeper next received the beggar's thanks.

The blind accordeon player then went on his way rejoicing, and playing "God Save the Queen" in four flats, while Mr. Husted rushed away to tell the news in the neighborhood.

Her Majesty then drove on as if nothing unusual had happened.

Charity is a beautiful thing!

The Obstacle in the Way.

"I fear it can never be, George," murmured the fair girl. "There are obstacles in the way."

"What are they, Laura?' demanded the young man, eagerly. "Perhaps I can overcome them."

"Papa has failed in business, and"——

"You needn't mention any more," said the young man dejectedly, as he got up from his knees.

Dissatisfaction.

Father (who has rushed to the spot)—What's the matter? Boy—Oh, dad, g-g-get me out of this! Father (slowly)—Well, if you ain't the hardest boy to please I ever see. Last summer I couldn't keep you out of this creek, and now yer cryin' because yer in.

Examinations in English schools go toward proving that color blindness is often declared to be present when really no organic defect but only poor training in the naming and distinction of colors is found to be the trouble.

Mr. Moody, after holding thirty days' services in San Francisco, commenced work in Oakland. He is assisted by Mr. Stebbins and Miss Pool. The Pavilion, which holds nearly 5,000, has been crowded at every meeting.

Bishop Lightfoot, of Durham, spends his whole official income, $35,000 a year, on church and educational work. He is now building, at his own expense, a large church in a poor and densely-populated part of Sunderland.

Mr. Samuel Carter Hall, who died in London recently, was born in 1801, and had been for two generations a noted figure in the English literary world. As barrister, journalist, artist and author he won the respect of his fellow-men, and his "Book of Gems," "Book of British Ballads" and "Baronial Halls" are all standard works. He and Mrs. Hall were said to have written and edited 340 volumes.

LIVING FOR THE STOMACH.

A Little Lecture to Those Who Crave and Have Rich Things to Eat.

Ah! you live for your stomach do you? I certainly pity the person who lives for no loftier purpose than eating and drinking. Upon second thought you conclude that your confession should have been taken with a grain of allowance. There does creep over you now and then a conviction that you live for something besides your stomach's sake. Very good. You are on the road to happiness. I knew a man once who often amused his hearers by putting some queer phrases into his prayers. He would pray that the nerve tissues of his stomach might be made more enduring, his taste more keenly enjoyable, and that his appetite might be tempted with the fat of the land, in order that he (the earthly fellow) might live many, many more years and take comfort as he went along. That man was eternally having cold sores upon his lips, and if the gout has not overtaken him by this time I have lost my guess. Why cold sores and gout? you ask.

Right, my fellow-sufferer, ask all the questions you care to. Why do you so often get all stuffed up with a "cold," so called, about which you go prancing over the neighborhood, asking everybody if, in the name of common sense, they can tell you how or where you "caught it?" You got it by eating. Hard thing to believe, isn't it? Rich food, fats and highly seasoned viands have done the business for you. The body is a queer machine. It gets clogged, and when it can hold out no longer it revolts. The brief warfare which follows, the wheezing, the aching bones and running nostrils are simply evidences of nature's efforts to recover her equilibrium. Then how vain of you to dose yourself with drugs, instead of giving the Great Healer time to cure you!

This is my theory: The system needs certain nourishments and requires them regularly. Incautiously you have given it too much. Here slips in a curious trick of nature. A morbid craving for food a little richer seizes you—a sort of dull longing for something, you know not what. Nature's mission is to try you and see what kind of metal you are made of. Now follow me closely. That longing comes straight from your carnal soul, though you have dignified it with the name of hunger. It is nothing more than an undue excitement of the nerves of the stomach. To the cook book you fly and con it over to find something tempting. Merely wholesome foods have failed to fill the bill. But, my friend, had you the correct understanding you would pass that craving by and wait.

Nature is as ready to join with you in a little self-discipline as she was to put the obstacle in your way. A slight tiff of self-denial will do wonders some times. Self-denial? Certainly; why not? You shout with vehemence that virtues of that order have long since become unpopular from disuse. What a brazen imposition would be a table without enough dainties to match the silver and china! So, "if you please, Mrs Blank, I would like you to have prepared a little brandy sauce for the pudding to day. I abominate food without something in it to tempt a fellow's palate." So off flies the cook at your peremptory bidding, lest she may have done something to forfeit her position, and sends you up—really, she puts before you a dish which the daintiest epicure can dote upon. Such, you say, is life. It is not life; it is death. There, you have dropped your knife and fork in dismay that I should say a thing so terrible. These are facts, my friends.—Frank Dexter in Boston Globe.

Plants in Witchcraft.

Occasionally when the dairymaid churned for a long time without making butter, she would stir the cream with a twig of mountain ash, and beat the cow with another, thus breaking the witch's spell. But, to prevent accidents of this kind, it has long been customary in the northern counties to make the churn-staff of ash. For the same reason herd boys employ an ash twig for driving cattle, and one may often see a mountain ash growing near a house. On the Continent the tree is in equal repute, and in Norway and Denmark rowan branches are usually put over stable doors to keep out witches, a similar notion prevailing in Germany. No tree, perhaps, holds such a prominent place in witchcraft lore as the mountain ash, its mystic power having rarely failed to render fruitless the evil influence of these enemies of mankind.

To counteract the spell of the evil eye, from which many innocent persons were believed to suffer in the witchcraft period, many flowers have been in requisition among the numerous charms used. Thus, the Russian maidens still hang round the stem of the birch tree red ribbon, the Brahmans gather rice, and in Italy rue is in demand. The Scotch peasantry pluck twigs of the ash, the Highland women the groundsel, and the German folk wear the radish. In early times the ringwort was recommended by Apuleius, and later on the fern was regarded as a preservative against this baneful influence. The Chinese put faith in the garlic, and, in short, every country has its own special plants. It would seem, too, that after a witch was dead and buried, precautionary measures were taken to frustrate her baneful influence. Thus, in Russia, aspen is laid on a witch's grave, the dead sorceress being then prevented from riding abroad.—By T. F. Thiselton Dyer, in the Popular Science Monthly for April.

Delicate Attention to the Author.

Daughter (to mother)—Young Mr. Lightsome has just written a book, and has presented me with a copy.

Mother—That is very nice, Laura.

Daughter—Yes; and, as Mr. Lightsome said something about making a call this evening, and I am very busy, I wish you would sit down and cut the leaves for me, and place it in a conspicuous place on the parlor table.

Ought to Hear Then.

Bagley (at the telephone)—There's no use in talking, Bailey. I can't hear the first word you say.

Bailey (at the other end)—Why don't you fold both your ears around the instrument?

His Excuse.

Lady (to drunken beggar)—Are you not ashamed to beg?

D. B.—Yes, ma'am, but I'm full; when I'm sober I'm a burglar.

ANTS FOR EATING.

They Are Good as Pickles—Some as Large as Foxes.

Should a Maine lumberman find a stump or rotten log with thousands of big black ants in it, says the Pittsburg Dispatch, he scoops the torpid insects from their winter domicile and fills his dinner pail with them. When he gets back to his camp at night he sets the pail in a cool place until his supper is ready, then brings it forth, and, while helping himself to pork and beans, helps himself also to ants. There is no accounting for tastes, and he esteems a handful of ants a very choice morsel. Ants are said by those who have tasted them to have a peculiarly agreeable, strongly acid flavor. The woodsmen, whose food consists largely of salted meat, baked beans and similar hearty victuals, naturally have a craving for something sour. "Ants are the very best of pickles," said an old "logger," who confessed to having devoured thousands of them. "They are cleanly insects, and there is no reason why they should not be eaten, if one can get over a little squeamishness caused by the thought of taking such crawling things into his stomach. There is nothing repulsive about them, and when a man has once learned to eat the creatures as pickles he prefers them to any other kind."

Ants have at various times and in different countries been quite extensively used in medicine, and formic acid, which was first obtained by distilling the bodies of these insects, but is now artificially prepared, is a well-known and useful chemical product. Herodotus tells us of ants that live in the deserts of India which are in size "somewhat less than dogs, but larger than foxes." These creatures, in heaping up the earth after the manner of common ants, were a very efficient aid to the Indian gold hunters. The sand which they threw up being largely mixed with gold, the Indians were accustomed to go to the desert in the heat of the day, when the ants were under ground, load the sand into sacks, pile the sacks upon their camels and hasten from the spot as rapidly as possible. The ants, according to the historian, were not only the swiftest of animals, but were gifted with such a sense of smell that they immediately became aware of the presence of men in their territory, and unless the Indians got away while the ants were assembling to attack them not a man could escape.

The Rash Ventures of a Conversationalist

Nothing so surely kills the freedom of talk as to have some matter-of-fact person instantly bring you to book for some impulsive remark flashed out on the instant, instead of playing with it and tossing it about in a way that shall expose its absurdity or show its value. Freedom is lost with too much responsibility and seriousness, and the truth is more likely to be struck out in a lively play of assertion and retort than when all the words and sentiments are weighed. A person very likely cannot tell what he does think until his thoughts are exposed to the air, and it is the bright fallacies and impulsive rash ventures in conversation that are often most fruitful to talker and listeners. The talk is always tame if no one dares anything. I have seen the most promising paradox come to grief by a simple "Do you think so?" Nobody, I sometimes think, should be held accountable for anything said in private conversation, the vivacity of which is in a tentative play about the subject. And this is a sufficient reason why one should repudiate any private conversation reported in the newspapers. It is bad enough to be held fast forever to what one writes and prints, but to shackle a man with all his flashing utterances, which may be put into his mouth by some imp in the air is intolerable slavery. A man had better be silent if he can only say to-day what he will stand by to-morrow, or if he may not launch into the general talk the whim and fancy of the moment. Racy, entertaining talk is only exposed thought, and no one would hold a man responsible for the thronging thoughts that contradict and displace each other in his mind. Probably no one ever actually makes up his mind until he either acts or puts out his conclusion beyond his recall. Why should one be debarred the privilege of pitching his crude ideas into a conversation where they may have a chance of being precipitated?—From "A Little Journey in the World," by Charles Dudley Warner, in Harper's Magazine for April.

Why the Cat is Not Harmed by a Fall.

It is quite wonderful to see a cat jump from a height. It never seems to hurt itself, or to get giddy with the fall. It always lands on its feet, and these are so beautifully padded that they seldom or never get broken. Why does not the animal get a headache after its jump? Why does it not receive a concussion of the brain, as a man or a dog would if he performed a similar acrobatic feat? To answer this we must examine a cat's skull, when we shall see that it has a regular partition wall projecting from its sides, a good way inward, toward the centre, so as to prevent the brain from suffering from concussion. This is indeed a beautiful contrivance, and shows an admirable internal structure, made in wonderful conformity with external form and nocturnal habits.

An Anchored Boarder.

Winks—How often do you change your boarding-house now, Jinks?

Jinks—I never change at all.

Winks—You don't. Perfectly comfortable, eh?

Jinks—No, I'm mighty uncomfortable; but I've changed often enough to know I never gain anything by changing.

Within the antarctic circle there has never been found a flowering plant. In the arctic region there are 762 kinds of flowers. Fifty of these are confined to the Arctic region. They are really polar flowers. The colors of these polar flowers are not as bright and varied as our own, most of them being white and yellow, as if borrowing these hardy hues from their snowy bergs and golden stars.

William Newman, Barnum's experienced elephant trainer, is credited with the following philosophical comment: "Elephants are very much like human beings, especially in one regard, and that is the females are very much better and nicer than the males, and also in that when a female is bad, she is worse than the worst male."

A despatch published in the daily papers last week gave the particulars of a sad affair at Lawrence station, N. B., by which Mrs. McGregor, wife of Rev. She went home last fall to spend the winter with her parents, and being troubled with sciatica had tried many remedies. The only one which gave her any relief was kerosene, and while applying that remedy too near the open stove her clothing caught fire. Every shred of her clothes was burned. Her sister, in making an effort to extinguish the flames, was severely burned about the hands and arms. Mrs. McGregor leaves a family of five small children, the eldest being about 13 years of age.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Balsam Valley Items.

From our own Correspondent

We have beautiful weather now, and by all appearances seeding will be upon us before we are ready for it, although everybody is getting their farming utensils in order as fast as possible.

Sugarmaking is the order of the day; a smoke in the daytime and a bright fire at night is seen in almost every bush. I am looking forward for a bid to a taffy spree which I expect some sugarmaker will make. I am very fond of taffy. Take away sugar from modern society and it will seem to sit still sucking its thumbs like a weaned child. What would we do without sugar? It is the only true butter for parsnips and the only salvation for dead beets. It gives the language such sounds as candy cake of caramel; it gives the dentist the pleasure of drawing more teeth, and it cures the gout; and the first young man who makes a taffy spree will soon discover that his popularity with the ladies depends on sugar. We sweeten tea as we drain its decoction off. Those who never stimulate must needs sweeten like the poor old lady in the story, who was equally fond of sweetening and devotion, and once in her life prevailed upon her preacher to sup with her. She used molasses to sweeten her coffee, and it was dear at the store, but to save him who was a sugar-lump man a mighty number of molasses. "My dear woman" he cried, "don't give me so much molasses just to sweeten tea." "Ah" replied the dear old lady, "I couldn't give too much molasses to such a good man." That's the way the girls will be with the first young man who makes a spree.

Mr. Venit Hill had a wood bee one afternoon recently. He got at 30 cords cut, and he gave the boys a spree at night, which the young fellers enjoyed very much. Mr. Neil McLean, south line, also had a woodbee, and got a large quantity of wood cut. We noticed something in last week's Advance bearing his signature. We have the gas effused in the article he speaks of and not drawn any of his senses, for he needs all he has got. He informs the public that he has found a successful remedy against goats. We congratulate him on his success. Mr. A McMullen, south line, also had a wood bee the same day, and many were the fair ones who were both ready and willing to trip the light fantastic toe to the sweet swelling music of the violin. About 12 o'clock there was a lull in the general proceedings, caused by three of the famous bullies piling on one of the Balsam Valley boys, who came out without a scratch, much to their surprise. He was more than a match for them in anything but eating pea. There was lots of tangle leg there, which no doubt was the cause of the trouble. It is high time the Scott Act was put in force there.

Mr. T. Ferguson and A. McDonald are thinking of going west soon.

I say! It is too bad that W. J. Blakeston and J. Ferguson should be blamed for our effusions. Has nobody around [illegible] brains but them!

[illegible]

Our population increaseth. There has lately been an addition to Mr. S. McDermot's family, and Mr. J. T. Wilson's. Sam will have to get a cradle. Jim had one long ago.

W. J. Blakeston says he is going to write to The Advance to inform the public that he is not the correspondent from this part.

I wonder who Oben is, anyway?

We are very sorry to have to chronicle the sad news of the death of Mr. Robert Bell, of Egremont, who died two weeks ago after a short illness. He taught in Egremont for a few years, and was loved and respected by all who knew him. His bereaved relatives have our sincere sympathies in their hour of trial.

Also the youngest child of Mr. and Mrs. Joe Ferris, aged about four months, was called out of this world of care and toil to inherit a blessing in that kingdom which consists of such.

Mr. John McLean is recovering fast, he will be around all right in a week or so.

Mr. H. McKechnie is still in bed with Rheumtism. We think he would make the long days seem short if he had a pipe and some tobacco, a luxury he is not allowed to indulge in.

Miss Christina McDonald left here for Toronto a few days ago. We miss her smiling face around the corner. Miss Jenette McKenzie is at present working at J. Campbell's. Miss Mary Lamond, from the Glen, is up on a short visit at Mr. Campbell's.

OBEN

Markdale.

From our own Correspondent.

"Hello, Jim! Were you at the open concert given by the I.O.G.T. in Haskett's Hall last night?"

"Yes, Will, I was there, and considered the whole affair a beastly farce with but two or three exceptions."

These are my sentiments. Although the admission was free, it was quite enough. The hall was chucked full and good order was not very well maintained, for the small boys were nearly tickled to death with some of the renditions, especially with those who rendered in a duet "When the Mists Have Cleared Away." The female voice in this piece was very much admired by the sporting portion of the assemblage, she having a rich and powerful tremolo voice. We have not time to particularize or to give an extended account of this wonderful concert, hence we will only mention the names of the performers, most of whom did very well. The Chief Templar, Mr. Jeffrey Artley, very ably filled the position of chairman. Rev Mr. Hosking, Messrs. Brown and Hunisech gave interesting addresses; Miss Mary Large, instrumental; Alf Moffat and Mr. Carlos sang two solos. E. Rutledge and Miss Littlejohn a duet (vocal); A. Moffat and J. Watson also a duet; S. Breadner, Hugh Harron and Miss Montgomery each gave a recitation; Mrs. Pickell, an essay; Herb. Hull and Will Buggin, each a reading. More anon.

No choir in the Methodist church last Sunday. The late cold wave seems to have taken possession of them, and has hushed the majority of their voices to a hoarse whisper, our skilful doctor not excepted.

DOMINION PARLIAMENT.

Mr. Laurier asked the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) to state on what day he intended to bring before the House his motion with reference to the Jesuits' Estates Bill, of which he had given notice.

Mr. O Brien—The hon. gentleman must be aware that since I gave notice in this matter there has been no opportunity upon which it could possibly be brought before the House. If the debate on the budget be closed to-morrow evening, as it is expected, and I am sure we all hope it may be, I shall be prepared to proceed with my motion on the next occasion on which the Finance Minister moves to go into Committee of Supply. Probably, in the ordinary course of events, that will be upon Thursday next, or upon the first occasion thereafter that may arise.

Mr. Laurier —I hope the Government will be prepared to go into Committee of Supply on Thursday next.

Sir John Macdonald—I shall take that into consideration between now and Thursday.

Mr. Laurier—When may we expect to have the papers brought down which have been asked for ?

Sir John Macdonald—To-morrow probably.

The following Bills were read a third time and passed :

Respecting the incorporation of the Northern Pacific and Manitoba Railway Company.

To incorporate the Ontario, Manitoba & Western Railway Company.

Sir John Thompson, in answer to the inquiry of Mr. Cook, said Senator Gowan was Judge of the county of Simcoe from 1843 to 1883. On his retirement he became entitled to the allowance to which judges are entitled who have served more than 25 years, of $1,723 annually.

Mr. Platt moved that it is expedient to remove the duty on and place upon the free list all grains and seeds which do not ripen in Canada, but which are now largely imported and sown for the production of food for cattle under the system of feeding called soiling and ensilage now largely adopted by the farmers of Canada. He said it would tax the ingenuity of hon. gentlemen opposite to show that there was anything in the resolution against the National Policy. It was an attempt to aid farmers in maintaining their standing and remove an obstacle in the way of their progress. The First Minister had declared in adopting the National Policy that he would endeavor to have the raw material used by all producers free of duty. It was greatly to be hoped that he would apply that policy to agriculturists.

Mr. McMillan (Huron) said the agricultural interests of Canada had suffered from the shrinkage that had taken place in produce and the shrinkage in price. It was a small request to make that the Government should aid the dairying interests. He hoped they would see their way clear to grant this request, in order that the farmers of Canada, being able to secure better and cheaper food, would be able to feed cattle more cheaply.

Mr. Haggart said that the corn imported into Canada paid a duty of 7½ cents per bushel. That duty was put on to protect our own corn. It was news to him that we could not grow good corn for feeding. He thought corn used for that purpose was grown in Hants and Essex.

Mr Charlton said the corn used for feed was known as mammoth sweet corn. The seeds would not ripen in Canada, but were imported. The removal of the duty would greatly aid in promoting the improved system of feeding.

Mr. Somerville said this seed could not be grown in Canada.

Mr. Mulock said that millet seed was also imported.

Mr. Bowell said his strongest objection to the resolution was that it was impracticable. Under it the Customs Department would have to inquire into every seed imported, and ascertain if it could be grown in any part of Canada. These corns, he believed, would in a short time become acclimatised.

Mr. Rowand said that the scarcity of food in the fall was disastrous to dairying interests.

Gen. Laurier, as a practical siloist, said that for ensilage purposes seed corn could not be grown anywhere in Canada. He imported his seed from the Southern States, and he bore strong testimony to the value of silage as food. He saw great difficulty in being able to distinguish between corn imported for silage growing and that which might be used to be fed in the grain

Mr. Foster said the discussion was not without profit, and the matter was well worth looking into, and if the Minister of Customs could see his way clear to meet the views expressed by so many practical farmers in the House, he (Mr. Foster) would be glad to give him all the assistance in his power.

Mr. Platt said he had put his motion on the paper without consulting any of his friends on the Opposition side, and it was not correct to say that he had brought it in from political motives. While there might be some difficulty in undertaking to distinguish between seed fodder corn and seed corn for feeding in grain, yet he had no doubt that the Department of Customs could devise a plan, and it was not fair that the farming interest should suffer on account of the inconvenience that might be caused to the Custom officials.

Mr. Kirkpatrick, coming from a district in which great drouth had prevailed during the last season, urged upon the Government the importance of encouraging the farmer to the full extent of their power to adopt the practice of growing corn for fodder purposes. He thought that if twine and salt could be brought in through the Customs free for fishing purposes, free seed corn could be in the same way supplied to farmers.

Mr. Laurier inquired as to the intentions of the Government with regard to fixing a day for the discussion of the motion of the member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) on the Jesuits' Estates Endowment Bill.

Sir John Macdonald said that in consequence of an informal communication from the leader of the Opposition he had conferred with the member for Muskoka, and with the consent of the hon. gentleman he proposed to bring on Supply early on Tuesday, when an opportunity would be given for moving the motion.

Mr. Laurier—Then we may expect the debate to come on Tuesday next ?

Sir John Macdonald—Yes, if the hon. member proceeds with his motion.

Mr. Davin inquired whether the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was taking steps to have the lakes and rivers of the North-west Territories stocked with varieties of fish not now found in those waters, but which from analogy and according to the opinion of competent persons should thrive there.

Mr Tupper said the department was making inquiries, and had received reports on the subject, and was now considering the difficulties connected with safely transporting fry to the waters in question.

Mr. Jones (Halifax), before the orders of the day, drew attention to the circumstances connected with the construction of a short line from the St. Lawrence to Moncton via Mattawamkeag and Harvey, and from Fredericton to Salisbury. In 1885 the Government granted a subvention of $250,000 per year for twenty years to the International Railway Company, or more properly the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. He quoted from a statement made by Sir Charles Tupper at the time, in which he distinctly assured the House that this subsidy would not be paid unless the line was fully completed. The company had failed to carry out the terms of their agreement by leaving that portion of the line from Mattawamkeag to Harvey and Salisbury unfinished, and he hoped the nature of the contract was such that the Government were able to protect the treasury from being drawn upon for the full amount of the subsidy in consequence of this failure. He was desirous that the contract should be laid before the House.

Sir John Macdonald said the papers would be brought down in a few days.

Mr. Jamieson moved the House into Committee on the Bill to incorporate the Supreme Court of the Independent Order of Foresters.

Mr. Paterson (Brant) said he was informed that the members of another Order of Foresters in Canada were apprehensive that the incorporation now of this Order might deprive them of the right to the distinctive name of Foresters in the general Bill incorporating all friendly societies, which was promised next year. He asked that the third reading be deferred till Friday, so that the other branches of this Order might be heard from.

Mr. Hall said the solicitor for the Independent Order, now being incorporated, had officially assured him, as Chairman of the Banking and Commerce Committee, that the Independent Order would not object to the other Orders of Foresters using their distinctive name. In fact the title "Independent Order" implied that there were other Orders of this association.

The Bill was reported from the committee with some slight amendments.

On the third reading of the Bill respecting reciprocity in wrecking,

Mr. Charlton moved an amendment looking towards reciprocity in towage.

Mr. Ferguson (Welland) supported the motion. He believed the passage of the Bill would show that there was no permanence in protection to Canadian industries. If there was no more permanence in the National Policy than the passage of this Bill would show, he would say it was time they changed their policy and ceased to delude investors. (Opposition applause.)

Mr. Waldie—Come over here.

Mr. Ferguson contended that if there were reciprocity, the Canadian wrecker should be placed on the same footing as the American wrecker, and be allowed to import his coal and raw material free of duty. (Opposition applause.) At least he hoped the House would support Mr. Charlton's amendment.

Mr. Kirkpatrick said that to tack on the amendment would destroy the Bill.

Sir Donald Smith supported the Bill, and trusted the House would accept it without the amendment.

The House divided on Mr. Charlton's amendment, which was lost by a vote of 56 yeas and 108 nays.

The Bill was read a third time.

Mr. Mitchell—This is clear evidence of want of confidence in the Government with reference to their policy on this subject. I would like to know what they are going to do.

Mr. Gilmour asked when the Bill with reference to frauds in milk would be considered.

Mr. Boyle said he would be prepared to go on with it next time it was reached.

Mr. Wallace asked when the Government would be prepared to have the Anti-Combines Bill proceeded with. He wanted to go on at the earliest opportunity and have a full discussion.

Sir Hector Langevin replied that he could not answer the question without consulting the First Minister.

In reply to Mr. Laurier it was stated by Sir Hector Langevin that the business for to-morrow would be the consideration of the Franchise Bill and that dealing with bills of exchange.

Mr. Tupper introduced a Bill respecting the harbor of Belleville in the Province of Ontario. He explained that the Bill proposed to repeal the existing Act, by which the harbor fees are collected by the town and place the harbor in commission.

The Bill was read a first time.

Mr. Sproule inquired if it was the intention of the Government, in view of extensive adulteration of lard imported from the United States, as shown by the report of the chief analyst in bulletin No. 7, Inland Revenue Department, to provide against its being brought into this country either by increased duty or otherwise.

Mr. Foster said the Government were not in a position to give an explicit answer to the question, but the subject was under consideration.

The House went into committee on the proposed resolution amending the Customs Act.

Mr. Bowell said that the changes proposed were not of the radical character which one would suppose them to be from reading the comments upon them in the newspapers. He did not propose to find fault with those comments, because the resolutions were so vague as to be easily misunderstood. The first amendment proposed would provide that no merchandise could be brought into Canada at night or on public holidays except by railway or boat. It had been the custom for persons to cart goods over the border at night and have them entered at the Custom house in the morning. If they were caught smuggling the excuse would be made that they intended to take the goods to the Custom-house next day.

Mr. Scriver—What do you mean by night? Would that include all the hours of darkness?

Mr. Bowell replied that by night he meant after office hours. It was also proposed to enact that inland transportation should be added to the value of goods, no matter from what country they were imported. It was a mistake to suppose that this was a new proposal. Under the present law the inland rates were added to the values, except where the goods were imported from Great Britain and Ireland. The proposal was to strike out this exception and treat all nations alike.

Mr. Casey—Very disloyal.

Mr. Bowell said it would not be considered disloyal when the reasons were known.

Mr. Paterson (Brant) asked if it was not true that the American Customs authorities had abandoned the provision in their law for adding inland charges to the value for duty.

Mr. Bowell said his latest information was that this was still the law in force in the United States. The motive in adding inland charges was not so much to increase the revenue as to secure greater uniformity in the cost of goods imported.

Mr. Paterson (Brant) read from the report of the special United States committee to the effect that the clause in the Customs regulations adding inland charges to value for duty had been repealed.

The resolution was reported, and a Bill founded on the same was introduced and read a first time.

Sir John Macdonald moved the House in committee to consider the resolution providing for pensions to certain members of the Northwest Mounted Police force. He stated that the object of the resolution was the greater efficiency of the force.

Mr. Mills regretted to see this proposal brought in, because it extended the pension principle, which he thought should be curtailed in every possible way. He did not think it desirable to retain the men on the force for long periods, for the reason that if so retained they became unsettled and unfit for any of the ordinary occupations of life.

Mr. McMullen opposed the pension, as the Mounted Police were at present getting every dollar they were worth.

Mr. Mitchell was against pensions altogether.

Mr. Wilson (Elgin) criticised the annually increasing expenditure on account of the Northwest Mounted Police Force. In the face of such enormous sums paid out to sustain this force he opposed the introduction of the pension system, which besides increasing the public charge would impair the efficiency of the force.

The resolutions were reported and a Bill founded on the same was introduced and read a first time

Sir John Thompson moved the House in committee on the Bill relating to Bills of Exchange, Cheques and Promissory Notes

Mr. Jones and others expressed the hope that the Minister would not press the Bill this session.

Sir John Thompson said the Bill was largely a copy of the English law, and was, he thought, one of the simplest measures before the House He asked that it should be proceeded with.

The Bill was considered for some time in committee, and progress was reported.

A WOMAN'S SUICIDE.

A Sight Which Chilled the Blood of Her Husband.

A Montreal despatch says : Sarah Hillis, wife of Robert Throsby, a respectable machinist residing on Delisle street, committed suicide early yesterday morning by cutting her throat with a large butcher knife. Throsby awoke about 5 o'clock and missed his wife from bed. As it was unusual for her to be up at such an early hour, he went in quest of her. On reaching the kitchen a horriole sight met his gaze. There lying upon the floor, near the stove, was his wife, cold in death, with a terrible gash across her throat. Beside her lay the weapon with which she committed the deed, a curious shaped butcher knife about two inches wide, with a sharp blade and a saw back. Throsby was greatly overcome by the sight, and it was some minutes before he recovered sufficiently to arouse his sons. Dr. Armstrong was summoned, but his services were of no avail, as the woman had been dead probably two hours previous to her discovery. The coroner was notified and held an inquest in the morning, when it was ascertained from the evidence given that the deceased had of late had attacks of epilepsy, during which her mind became affected and she was not accountable for her actions. It was during one of these attacks that she ended her life. A verdict of suicide while in a state of mental aberration was rendered. The deceased was 40 years of age and the mother of several children.

Friendship in Cookery.

What could possibly be less closely associated than cranberries in a swamp and turkeys in a farm yard? Yet is a roast turkey ever quite perfect without cranberry sauce? Pigs and apples may be supposed to be related, for a pig in an orchard is the very creature to destroy more fruit than a cyclone, yet is roast pig ever supremely delicious without apple sauce? Do reasoning beings ever eat roast beef without a longing for mashed potatoes? It is possible, but it is improbable. There is a natural friendship between the two articles. Precisely why quails should go with toast, or truffles and mushrooms with cream, I cannot say, only it is nature, and that is enough. There are three pre-eminent berries, you four, and you must know their affinities to truly enjoy them. All the world knows that strawberries should go with cream; that red raspberries shou'd be found in shortcake; that black raspberries should be eaten in bread and milk, and that blackberries are never quite themselves outside of pies and puddings. Codfish is disreputable alone, but a ball of codfish and potato would tempt a saint to break a fast and lose his soul.—Mary E. Spencer in Globe Democrat.

Wherein Her Success Lay.

Mother (to daughter) -I understand, my dear, that you made quite an impression at the conversazione the other evening.

Daughter--Yes, mamma.

Mother—What subject did you discuss?

Daughter—I didn't discuss anything, mamma; I let others do the discussing.

LABOUCHERE'S TATTLE.

The Queen's Highland Gillie—Wedding Engagement—A Devout Catholic—The Pope's Income.

A London cable says: The aboriginal inhabitants of Biarritz are considerably astonished and diverted by the demeanor and costume of the Highland gillie who sits on the box of the Queen's carriage, and who is the individual who succeeded John Brown as Her Majesty's personal servant, being a near relative to that deceased domestic.

There is every probability that the engagement of the hereditary Prince of Hohenlohe to one of the young Princesses of Wales will shortly be announced.

I hear that the Queen seriously contemplates purchasing the Crown lease of Stafford House from the Duke of Sutherland. This lease has about thirty-six years to run.

The Prince Regent Luitpold, of Bavaria, who is a devout Catholic and a rigid purist, will only allow the Oberammergau passion play to be performed next year on the condition that the text be previously revised by the senior court chaplain at Munich.

The Pope's income for 1888 amounted to $2,520,000, of which $1,860,000 came from the St. Peter's pence, and $600,000 from the interest of money invested out of Italy. The outlay of the Vatican only amounted to $1,700,000. This is a highly satisfactory balance sheet, but it does not take into account the sum of $2 400,000 which His Holiness received in money and presents during his jubilee. I should think that the Emperor of Russia and the King of Italy must be devoured by envy at the flourishing financial condition of the Vatican.

A DYNAMITE EXPLOSION.

One Workman Blown to Atoms and Another Fearfully Mutilated.

A Philadelphia despatch says : A sound like the combined roar of hundreds of cannon, followed by the ascension of a huge black cloud of smoke to a towering height, startled the inhabitants of Lakewood, N.J., and the adjacent villages at 1 p. m. yesterday. The earth was shaken as if by an earthquake. An explosion had occurred in the mixing-room of the works of the United States Dynamite Company, three miles from Tom's River. Thomas Haggerty and Wm. Nichols were the only occupants of the room. Nichols was blown to atoms and Haggerty died in less than an hour. He was unable to explain the accident. His body was terribly mutilated and he suffered great agony. The shock was perceptible in all the towns and villages within fifteen or twenty miles. At Tom's River many citizens were greatly alarmed. Some buildings were violently shaken and the earth trembled. At Manchester and Farmingdale the report was distinctly heard. The United States Dynamite Company located its factory near Tom's River about four years ago. Three explosions have occurred there, in which five men were killed and three maimed for life.

THE AMERICAN PILGRIMS.

Sight-Seeing in Rome—Naples to be Next Visited.

A Saturday night's Rome cable says : Since their arrival the pilgrims have been busy from morning till night visiting the interesting monuments of pagan and Christian Rome. Every place and thing of note have been seen. To the great regret of all, Right Rev. Bishop Wigger is obliged, on account of sickness, to leave the pilgrimage. He is improving, and will be out in a few days. On account of the illness of Mrs. Lilly Mr Lilly, of New York, is obliged to stay in Rome. The pilgrims attended mass in the chapel of the Papal throne, and received Holy Communion from the hands of Right Rev. Bishop Rodemacher. A short address was given by the bishop at the close of mass. The pilgrims will leave Rome with regret and with most kindly feelings for the priests and people. They start at 7 o'clock for Naples, whence, after a stay of a few days, they will sail for Alexandria. A reception will be given to them this evening by Count and Countess Moore.

Why Widows Are Wily and Winsome.

It is undeniable that widows are the autocrats of society, and men flock about them wherever they go. No one has ever denied their fascinations, and Weller's advice to his son, if he wished to avoid matrimony, to "bevare of vidders," has been quoted thousands of times. In many ways the widow has the advantage of her younger sisters. She has the benefit of a large knowledge and experience of the world, her arts and coquetries are perfected, not in the experimental and undeveloped state of the debutantes, and, above all, she has the inestimable advantage of knowing men with the accurate and intimate knowledge gained by association with one who was probably a fair representative of his sex. She knows how to give delicious little dinners that make the most hardened bachelor think indulgently of the marriage state. She knows that man likes his ease, and does not insist on his dancing in perpetual attendance on her. She does not insist on a man's talking about balls and theatres and new german figures. She follows rather his lead to his own ground, and listens with subtle flattery in eyes and face while he descants on his favorite hobby. A young girl is always self-centred, absorbed in her own affairs, her dresses, her parties—it is only grace and art that teach a woman to sink her own personality in the presence of the person with whom she is talking. Perhaps one of the chief claims of widows is their understanding of the fine art of sympathy. The sympathy of a young girl who has known nothing but joy is a crude and unsatisfying affair, the very husks on which no love could feed; but the sympathy of a widow, tenderly, daintily expressed, with a gentle melancholy that shows that she too has suffered—it is like the soft shadows in a picture, or the minor chord in a piece of music that sets the pulses throbbing. Having mourned for a man she knows how most effectively to mourn with one.—New Orleans Picayune.

Sir Charles Russell, the great cross-examiner, has a hard voice, coal-black whiskers and heavy eyebrows.

Mr. Henry Chaplin is said to be "the best dressed man" in Parliament. He is one of the tallest men in the Commons, where the average of stature is high, and his gaiters are said to "form a bright spot of color below the gangway."

PARALLEL LINES.

Every student knows that in close reasoning parallel lines of thought are laid down and deductions educed.

We have drawn the above visible lines simply to bring them prominently before your eye and to ask what they represent to you.

A railroad man to whom we showed them said, "To me those four lines represent a double-track railway."

A doctor replied to the same interrogatory, "The lines are to me the large arteries and veins lying alongside each other in the human body."

As every intelligent man or woman knows, the blood of every living person flows with almost railroad speed through the arteries, forced by that wonderful engine, the heart. From the arteries it is side-tracked through the capillaries and veins, and every drop of blood goes through the kidneys for purification no less than 2,500 times every twenty-four hours. If the kidneys be diseased the impurities of the blood containing the worn out tissues, and deleterious acids are not drawn out or excreted as nature intended, but continually pass and repass through every fiber of the system, carrying death and decay with every pulsation. Unless remedied the heart becomes weakened, the lungs trying to do double work break down, the liver becomes congested, the stomach refuses to digest food and the result is a general break down.

Why ?

Because the kidneys, the sewers of the system, are foul and stopped up, and the entire blood becomes nothing more nor less than sewage.

Now is it not criminal, nay, suicidal, to allow such a state of things to continue when a simple remedy is within your reach, known for a certainty to do as represented, which will open the closed pipes of the kidneys, allow the effete matter to escape, relieve the over-worked heart, lungs and liver, cause a healthy appetite, put the bloom of health in your cheek, the dove of hope in your breast and the light of life in your eye ?

Do not allow prejudice to blind you to your best interests, but to-day procure Warner's safe cure and be put on the straight road to rude health and correct living.

Our parallel and closing lines to you are take our advice and your experience will justify you in thanking us for bringing under your notice a remedy without a parallel.

GOLD IN THE NORTH.

Rich Placer Diggings Reported at the Headwaters of the Athabasca.

An old-time trader from the Far North passed through Donald one day this week on his way to the coast. He told a friend here that the half breeds of the Northwest had discovered rich placer diggings in creeks that form the headwaters of the Athabasca River. The gold is reported as coarse and the bedrock shallow. The half-breeds are keeping the find very quiet, and the trader said it was difficult to obtain authentic information as to the precise location of the ground The one thing that he had positive knowledge of was that the ground is rich and the gold coarse. The head-waters of the Athabasca can easily be reached from Donald ; in fact, Donald would be the British Columbia outfitting point for the new diggings. From Donald down the Columbia River to the Boat Encampment is sixty miles, good boating water ; from the Boat Encampment over the old Hudson's Bay Company portage to Committee Punch Bowl Lake is 40 miles, and that lake is the source of the Athabasca River. That would make the total distance from Donald but little over 100 miles. The trader did not expect to remain more than a week on the coast, then would return to his trading post in the Northwest, outfit a party and start for the diggings. It has long been supposed that gold in paying quantities would be found in that country, and now the supposition is a certainty.—Donald Truth.

Paint the Shingles.

The Timberman very wisely remarks that it has always seemed singular that in the use of paint to preserve wood exposed to the weather, the fact that a shingle roof was omitted from the catalogue was invariably the rule. This idea or oversight was one of those things in which custom becomes habit, and because every one else did so, all the rest followed suit. It is safe to presume that the custom of leaving the shingle roof unpainted originated in its angular form being less exposed to the after effects of rain or snow. A little thought will show the folly of such a conclusion when remembering the frail nature of a shingle and the slight fastening it has. If paint would be useful on any weather-exposed surface, it should certainly be so on a roof. This fact goes without telling, and in the present style of suburban residences the roof receives its share of paint along with the rest of the building, thus at once combining the useful with the beautiful. It is certainly singular that painting of roofs has not always prevailed, and is adds much to the finished character of the building to see the roof painted.

An Awful Swell.

A small boy was calling the other day on one of his school friends and fell into conversation with the mother of the latter. He was led to remark that it was getting very hard to tell, from the places in which people live, whether they are entitled to social consideration or not.

"Now, there is Blank street," he said; "you wouldn't think anybody that lives on Blank street was much, would you? But there's Mr. T., he lives there."

"And is Mr. T. much?" she asked, not unwilling to draw him on.

"Mr. T.," he repeated, with the air of one who is overwhelmed with astonishment that so obvious a fact should have escaped the knowledge of anybody. "I should think he was! He's an awful swell. Why, he won't speak to my father!"

Reason for Marrying.

"So, in spite of all your previous resolutions, you are going to marry?" "Only out of revenge. My best friend has just married, and did not invite me to the wedding. I will be revenged."

Dutch Lullaby.

Wynken, Blynken and Nod one night
  Sailed off in a wooden shoe—
Sailed on a river of misty light
  Into a sea of dew.
"Where are you going and what do you wish?"
  The old moon asked the three.
"We have come to fish for the herring-fish
  That live in this beautiful sea;
  Nets of silver and gold have we,"
    Said Wynken,
    Blynken,
    And Nod.

The old moon laughed and sung a song
  As they rocked in the wooden shoe,
And the wind that sped them all night long
  Ruffled the waves of dew;
The little stars were the herring-fish
  That lived in the beautiful sea.
"Now cast your nets wherever you wish,
  But never afeard are we"—
  So cried the stars to the fishermen three,
    Wynken,
    Blynken,
    And Nod.

All night long their nets they threw
  For the fish in the twinkling foam.
Then down from the sky came the wooden shoe,
  Bringing the fishermen home.
'Twas all so pretty a sail it seemed
  As if it could not be.
And some folks thought 'twas a dream they dreamed
  Of sailing that beautiful sea.
  But I shall name you the fishermen three:
    Wynken,
    Blynken,
    And Nod.

Wynken and Blynken are two little eyes,
  And Nod is a little head,
And the wooden shoe that sailed the skies
  Is a wee one's trundle-bed;
So shut your eyes while mother sings
  Of wonderful sights that be,
And you shall see the beautiful things
  As you rock on the misty sea
  Where the old shoe rocked the fishermen three:
    Wynken,
    Blynken,
    And Nod.

Kind Deeds Appreciated.

All the friends of the late Deputy Reeve Martin who attended him during his sufferings bear testimony to the great care and attention shown the wounded gentleman and indeed all the sufferers by Dr. Kitchen, of St. George. His residence since the accident has been transformed into a hospital and all that medical skill, money, care and forethought could do for the inmates was done in the kindest and most open-hearted manner. Dr. Olmsted, of Hamilton, who was not only a physician but a nurse to Mr. Martin—attending him constantly during his illness—will also be gratefully remembered. The people of St. George have by their kindness towards the sufferers placed hosts of friends of the sufferers in all parts of the country under lasting obligations to them.—Woodstock Standard.

Tale of the Festive Grasshopper.

When a Kansas editor makes an affidavit that he saw a grasshopper light down on the back of a robin and lift him two feet high, in an effort to carry him off, it is simply one solitary instance of the richness of the soil of the State. Next year they are going to tame the grasshopper and use him to hunt rats.—Huntsville (Ala.) Mercury.

T. Granger Stewart, M.D., F.R.S.E., Ordinary Physician to H. M. the Queen in Scotland, Professor of Practice of Physic in the University of Edinburgh, in an article on Bright's disease, says: "Dyspnœa (difficult breathing) is frequently met with in the inflammatory and cirrhotic forms of the disease and may be independent of any local lesion, being probably a result of uræmic poisoning." And it is well known that uræmic poisoning arises from kidney disease. So much known, it remains to recognize the fact that, to remedy an effect the cause must be removed, and it is universally acknowledged that Warner's Safe Cure is the only reliable remedy for kidney disease.

King Alexandria of Servia is 13. The heiress of King William of the Netherlands is 9. King Alfonso of Spain is almost 8. "Rockaby, baby, on the tree top; when the wind blows the cradle will rock," and "when the bough breaks the cradle will fall."

ONTARIO LEGISLATURE.

The following Bills were read a third time and passed

To give representation in the Legislative Assembly to the District of Nipissing—Mr. Hardy.

Respecting steam threshing machines—Mr. Drury.

To protect the beaches and shores of the Province against depredation—Mr. Drury.

The Bill to amend the Public Health Act (Mr. Gibson, Hamilton) was read the third time. It provides that in the unorganized districts the stipendiary magistrates may act as ex officio medical health officers, and that the health board may, subject to the approval of the Lieutenant Governor, appoint sanitary inspectors. The Bill has been framed to meet the exigencies of an epidemic in Nipissing.

The Bill to amend the Free Libraries Act (Mr. Ross, Middlesex) was read the second time. It empowers Free Library Boards to establish evening classes for the instruction of mechanics, etc.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton) introduced a Bill to amend the Ontario Insurance Act.

Mr Whitney's Bill to amend the Election Act came up for a second reading. He explained the object of the Bill, which was to amend the present law in the direction of adding punishment by imprisonment to that of the money penalty already inflicted for offences of bribery, intimidation and undue influences. According to his proposition persons found guilty of bribery should be fined $200, as at present, and also be liable to a term of six months' imprisonment or more. He was very strongly of the opinion that the pecuniary punishment alone was quite inadequate. It also provided that persons receiving bribes should be liable to a term of imprisonment in addition to the existing fine. Persons using undue influence at elections should also be subject to imprisonment. He said that the present fine of $200 for bribery was a mere public farce, and there was a great deal of corruption taking place during the general elections. His experience had proved conclusively that the punishment imposed by the present law was entirely inadequate to the magnitude of the offence. The present law had not decreased bribery and corruption, and it was within his knowledge that many men consented to have elections voided and a new election ordered to save further revelations. The proposed Bill would act more as a deterrent than the present law.

Hon. Mr. Mowat, in replying, said that his difficulty was that he was afraid the proposed Bill would do more harm than good. The present difficulty was in getting a conviction, even when the punishment was merely pecuniary. If the defendant was liable to imprisonment as well as a money fine his friends would be all the more anxious to shield him, and the difficulty of convicting would be augmented. He would be delighted to find a way to lessen the amount of bribery done, but he was satisfied that the view of his hon. friend to increase the punishment of it was not one which would be of any good. In the Dominion law they had imprisonment provided for bribery at Dominion elections, and there was more bribery at the general elections than at the provincial. He thought that this addition was not one which would serve its purpose, besides it was too late in the session to consider a Bill of such magnitude in all its details.

Mr. Meredith followed in support of the Bill. He said that something must be done in the way of inflicting a term of imprisonment in addition to a money fine. The reason why the Dominion Act had not operated as it was intended was that judges had not seen their way to enforce the law harshly at present. More than one judge, however, had stated that in future persons convicted of bribery need not expect to escape as easily as on previous occasions. It was an anomaly that men should be punished more severely for impersonation, a comparatively minor offence, than for wholesale bribery.

The motion for a second reading upon being put to a division was lost.

Yeas—Messrs. Clark, H E Toronto), Clarke (Wellington), Cruess, Fell, Garson, Hess, Hudson, Lees, Meacham, Meredith, Miller, Morgan, Rorke, Smith (Frontenac), Stewart, Tooley, Whitney, Willoughby, Wylie—19.

Nays—Messrs. Allan, Armstrong, Bishop, Blezard, Chisholm, Dence, Drury, Field, Freeman, Gibson (Hamilton), Gilmour, Gould, Graham, Harcourt, Hardy, Lyon, McLaughlin, Master, Merrin, Mowat, O'Connor, Phelps, Rayside, Ross (Huron), Ross (Middlesex), Smith (York), Snider, Sprague, Waters, Wood (Brant)—30.

Mr. Snider's Bill respecting Municipal Fire Insurance was withdrawn.

Dr. Gilmour's Bill to require the owners of elevators and hoists to guard against accidents was read a second time and referred to the special committee on Bill 133.

Mr. Chisholm's Bill to amend the Act respecting mortgages and sales of personal property was withdrawn.

Mr. Balfour's Bill to amend the Manhood Suffrage Act was withdrawn.

Mr. Meredith inquired of the Leader of the Government as to when he intended to take up the railway resolution.

Mr. Mowat replied that his own impression was that the matter would be taken up Wednesday, but he did not wish to state positively just at the moment, as he was not sure.

The following Bills were introduced and read a first time:

To Amend the Ontario Insurance Act—Mr. Gibson.

The Municipal Act Amendment Act of 1889—Mr. Hardy.

The Assessment Act Amendment Act of 1889—Mr. Hardy.

The Ditches and Watercourses Act Amendment Act of 1889—Mr. Waters.

Mr. Ross (Middlesex) introduced a Bill to amend the Public School Act The Bill was read a first time.

The following Bills were passed through Committee of the Whole:

To amend the Public Health Act—Mr. Gibson (Hamilton).

To amend the Free Libraries Act—Mr. Ross (Middlesex).

On the order for the House going into Committee of Supply,

Mr. Craig moved the following amendment:

"The English language is the language of the Province of Ontario, and no system of public instruction which does not insure that in every school aided by Provincial funds, or supported in whole or in part by local taxation, the teachers employed are capable of imparting instruction in the English tongue, and that every pupil is instructed in it, and which does not recognize and act upon the recognition that the English language is to be the language of such schools, and require that the books in use in them, except those employed in giving religious instruction when and where such instruction is permitted by law, shall be approved of by the Department having the charge of educational affairs, is satisfactory to this House or will meet with the approval of the people of this Province."

He said that the letter of Mr. McLaren, a supporter of the Government, in the Globe showed that unless precautions were taken French would displace English in the Province. The Prescott Advocate, of L'Orignal, said in an editorial: "It must be admitted that the Minister of Education must have been misinformed when he said in the House that English was taught in all the Public Schools of Ontario." It stated that many of the teachers could not speak English, and it could be easily understood why in such cases English was not taught. He had re-examined the book used in the French schools, and from which he had quoted, and which the Government had contended was a catechism and not a text-book, and found it was entitled "Syllabair," which translated meant "spelling-book." (Applause.)

Mr. Mowat said there was no objection to the motion of the hon. gentleman so far as related to the Public Schools, but brought forward as it was it was a vote of want of confidence. But the motion referred to Separate Schools, and he was not prepared to say the Government had any jurisdiction over them in regard to text-books. It would, no doubt, be a good thing if the Government had this power. He referred the House to the 93rd sec. B. N. A. Act to show that the Separate Schools could not be interfered with in this matter. On these grounds he must ask the House to reject the amendment.

The House then went into committee on Bill 59 to amend the law of slander.

Mr. French moved some verbal alterations.

Mr. Hardy described the measure as one of the most astounding ever attempted to be put on the statute books of any civilized country.

Mr. A. F. Woods opposed the Bill as one which would simply be an inducement to young lawyers to get up cases.

Mr Fraser supported the Bill, contending that many men suffered as keenly as women did through certain slanders. He saw no reason why men should be excluded from the operations of the Bill.

Mr. Mowat would support the Bill if it were made to apply to women only.

The Bill was amended and reported

Mr. Leys' Bill 176—To Prevent the Spread of Contagious Diseases—was read a second time and referred to a special committee composed of Messrs Drury, French, Freeman, Gilmour, Waters, Willoughby and Leys.

The Bill to amend the Act respecting the study of anatomy (Mr McKay) was read the third time and passed.

The remainder of the session was taken up in the consideration in Committee of the Whole of Mr. Hardy's Bill, "The Municipal Amendment Act, 1889."

Mr. Creighton, in the absence of Mr. Meredith, called attention to the case of Mr. S. M. Davis, who in July, 1887, was assaulted by Mr. Macdonald, Deputy Clerk of the Crown in Huron, and subsequently gained a verdict of $100 damages in a civil suit. Mr. Davis is now walking on crutches and is injured for life. So far as the public are aware, no action has been taken by the Attorney-General, and it ought not to be understood that the Attorney-General would condone such an offence.

Mr. Mowat said the evidence showed that both parties at the time had been drinking. At the trial of the suit the doctor would not say that the injury from which Davis suffered was caused by the assault, and hence the small amount of damages returned. Davis wished the Government to dismiss Macdonald, but in the circumstances they did not think themselves justified in so doing.

The House went into Committee of Supply on the supplementary estimates, which were passed without opposition.

Mr. Guthrie's Bill to amend the law in certain matters of procedure was passed in committee.

Mr. Conmee's Bill respecting the Port Arthur Water, Light and Power Company was also passed in committee and read the third time.

Mr. Metcalf moved for an order of the House for a return of copies of all correspondence between the authorities of the University of Toronto and the authorities of any other university or universities in Ontario, relating to uniform matriculation examinations and a uniform scale of fees. He explained that he considered a uniform matriculation for all the universities in the Province would be of much benefit to the cause of higher education in the Province.

Mr. Ross (Middlesex) said the motion was of much interest to those interested in the cause of higher education. The universities had the right by charter to fix their own matriculation examinations, and such a thing as common matriculation could not be accomplished without the consent of all parties. Some correspondence had passed between the universities, and no doubt the end desired would be secured in due time.

The motion carried.

Mr. Blyth moved for an order of the House for a return showing the amounts due to the Land Improvement Fund arising from the sales of Grammar School lands in the township of Proton up to the 30th day of October, 1858. Such returns to include all collections up to 1st July, 1867. He explained that this was a matter of vast importance to his constituency.

The motion was carried.

NEWSPAPER CRITICISM.

It is a privilege every newspaper reserves to itself to criticize, adversely if needs be, for the public benefit's, anything in which the public is deeply interested.

It is the custom of H. H. Warner & Co., proprietors of the renowned Kidney and Liver Cure, better known as "Warner's Safe Cure," to flood the country with medical pamphlets The writer has taken the liberty to examine one of these marvellous little books and finds food for criticism, but, before indulging in it, will give our readers some quotations therefrom, from the highest medical authorities, which we believe worthy of consideration. Under the head of "No Distinctive Symptoms Apparent," we find:

First—More adults are carried off in this country by chronic kidney disease than by any other one malady except consumption. —Thompson.

Second—Deaths from such diseases are increasing at the rate of 250 per cent. a decade —Edwards.

Third—Bright's Disease has no symptoms of its own, and may long exist without the knowledge of the patient or practitioner, as no pain will be felt in the kidneys or their vicinity.—Roberts.

Fourth—In the fatal cases—and most cases have hitherto been fatal—the symptoms of diseased kidneys will first appear in extremely different organs of the body as stated above.—Thompson.

Fifth—Only when the disease has reached its final and fatal stages may the usual symptoms of albumen and tube casts appear in the water, and will great pain rack the diseased organs.—Thompson.

Sixth—Bright's disease, which usually has three stages of development, is a universal disease in England and America.—Roberts and Edwards.

Thompson is authority for saying that more adults are carried off in this country by kidney disease than any other malady except consumption. Under Warner's "Safe Cure" article on Consumption, we find a paragraph claiming to be a quotation from a publication issued by Brompton Hospital for Consumptives, London, England, which states that 52 per cent. of the patients of that institution have unsuspected kidney disorder. Dr. Herman Brehmer, an eminent German authority, also says that Consumption is always due to deficient nutrition of the lungs, because of bad blood

Medical science can no longer dispute the fact that the kidneys are the principal blood purifying organs of the human system, and if they are diseased and thus fail to expel the uric acid poison or the waste matter of the blood, as the blood passes through these two great organs, the "Safe Cure" claim is correct, and the reasoning of its proprietor holds good.

There is no doubt but that in too many instances the medical fraternity doctor for symptoms, instead of striking at the root of the disease, and that under this form of treatment many patients die.

Risking Health for Fashion.

The time is now at hand when the average girl goes in for getting pneumonia; the sun shines, and she thinks there is no reason in the world why she should not wear her cloth gown without a wrap, thus showing the pretty curves of her figure. American women are Parisians in this. It cannot be denied that a very well fitting bodice, drapery arranged to look sufficiently full and yet not to be cumbersome, a lace scarf or a boa thrown around one's throat is, after the wearing of a long winter coat, very attractive, but it can be mentioned that it is to nobody's advantage except to the doctor's and the apothecary's. A few women who will dress this way, who will look their best on the street, follow it up by the very sensible treatment that they get at home—that is to say, they are rubbed either with alcohol or cod liver oil, and then rest a couple of hours. It takes a deal of courage, this being rubbed with cod liver oil, and yet it is one of the fashionable fads. You may use no end of perfume in the effort to make yourself sweet after it, but the scent of the oil—by no means oil of roses—will cling to you most persistently, and in addition will do everything in its power to perfume everything belonging to you. However, if the fashionable maiden determines that this odor shall be counted smart, be very certain that before Lent is over she will be declaring it the most delicious, the most healthful and the most altogether delightful of sweetnesses. Systematic scrubbing at the Russian bath may, it is possible, remove the oil, but it is very certain that a mere hot bath will only seem to make it come to the surface more and to make one more conscious of being a fishwoman ready for exhibition at a dime museum on the Bowery.—New York Cor. Chicago Herald.

An Apology After All.

Mr. Stern—You acted very impolitely to me last night at the ball when you were intoxicated I think you should apologize.

Young Blowhard—I will not apologize to or for any man.

"Is that so? Well, don't you think you yourself are an apology for a man?"

"Bright's Disease has no symptoms of its own," says Dr. Roberts, of the University of New York City. Additional proof why Warner's Safe Cure cures so many disorders which are only symptoms of kidney disease.

For the effectual protection of woollen goods against moths the use of cedar wood boxes and closets is insufficient, and it is stated that there is no other means of protection against the ravages of the insect but to perfectly inclose the woollens in material which is not attacked by the moth, such as cotton cloth. Woollen goods brushed clean from dust, folded together and put into cotton bags which were well tied, have been found perfectly intact when taken out at the change of the season.

Mr. Lewis, solicitor for the Parnellites, has secured Richard Pigott's diary, and will produce it before the Parnell Commission.

Since the 4th of March President Harrison's letters run from 600 to 700 a day, sometimes reaching 1,000 letters.

PNEUMONIA.

The Necessity of Keeping Up the Temperature and the Body Warm.

A doctor says that March and April are distinctively pneumonia months, and pneumonia stalks in wherever the fire is permitted to get down to the minimum, whether in church or private house. The men, too, who throw off their overcoats and run about the streets in the teeth of a north or northwest wind are playing a losing game with pneumonia. The man who just "runs across the street" out of his warm office without an overcoat is tempting pneumonia. Lord Bacon once said that an easterly wind is "neither good for man or beast." The same may be said of our March winds unless man and beast are properly protected. Of course the only way to meet the pneumonia months with any chance of victory is to continue the operation of replenishing the coal bin. The choice is simply between health and a full coal bin, and the latter is not nearly so expensive as the daily visitations of a doctor loaded with costly prescriptions and professional advice.

Curability of Consumption.

This has been a vexed question among physicians, opinions, even in the same school, being strangely divergent. Of this, however, the public are convinced: It is a terribly prevalent disease, and the average doctor meets with but scant success in treating it. Consumption is in reality scrofula of the lungs, and is liable to attack any whose blood is tainted. For driving out the scrofulous humors, and thus removing the predisposing cause, Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery is a sovereign remedy. It purifies bad blood, heals scrofulous ulcers, and, whatever difference of opinion exists as to curing advanced cases of consumption, it remains that many pronounced "incurable" have been by it brought back from the brink of the grave to restored health and vigor.

Four at a Birth.

The wife of a collier named Isaac Evan, residing at Cwmtwrch, near Swansea, gave birth to four children on Tuesday. Two of the children are alive and doing well, but the mother and the other two expired in a few hours.

Female Beauty.

It is a fortunate thing that all men do not have the same taste in female beauty, for otherwise they would all fall in love with the same woman, which would be awkward. Although the preferences of men for different style of form and feature vary greatly, it is, undoubtedly a fact that an appearance indicative of health is pleasing to all alike. A woman may be without regular features, yet, if healthy, she will be beautiful to some one and pleasing to all. A sallow complexion, a dull eye, a system debilitated by unnatural discharges, in short, all the ills attendant upon the irregularities and "weaknesses" peculiar to the sex, can be banished by the use of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. Ask your druggist.

The Fashions Safe.

Wife—I declare I am almost ashamed to go to church with this hat on. It isn't at all the fashion.

Husband—Is this Bridget's Sunday out

Wife—No.

Husband—Why don't you borrow hers?

What's the sense in saying that Catarrh cannot be cured when Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy is so sure and positively certain that the proprietors offer $500 reward for a case of Catarrh which they cannot cure. A full pint of the medicine is made by dissolving one fifty-cent package of the powder in water. Sold by druggists; 50 cents.

An Easy Language.

Mr. Winks (reading)—Prof. Davidson says that the English language is easier to acquire than any other language spoken.

Mrs. Winks—Of course it is. Even our baby is learning it.

The Old Man's Views.

City Lover—Do you think your father will look with favor on my suit?

Rural Belle—I'm afraid not. He hates store clothes.

—This is the time the careless man empties a barrel of loose papers in the gutter to be blown on the sidewalks and lawns of his neighbors. Whoever empties loose papers in the streets should be compelled to gather them up one by one. This would be simple justice.

The remains of John Bright were interred on Saturday in the cemetery at Rochdale, the funeral ceremonies being of the simplest and plainest character.

Hon. J. H. Pope, Minister of Railways and Canals, died at Ottawa on Monday. The deceased minister was 65 years of age. The remains were interred at Cookshire, Quebec, yesterday.

COUNTY AND DISTRICT.

Diphtheria is prevalent at Camilla and Mono Centre.

Samuel Noble, arrested for theft in Shelburne, escaped from the lockup last week and has not been recaptured.

The Dundalk Herald and Markdale Standard are howling because two newspapers copied items from their paper without giving credit. Boo hoo! Boo hoo!—[Creemore Star.

Mr. Thos. Turner, of the 9th con., Brant, lost three valuable fattening cattle one day last week. He let them out for water and they broke through the ice on the Saugeen river and were drowned. Mr. Turner has been most unfortunate in this respect, as he lost a number of cattle in the same way last spring.—[Bruce Herald.

A young woman in Dresden, named Emily Steel, aged 17 years, died a short time ago from a peculiar disease. On the Sunday previous to her death she commenced sneezing, and although nothing was thought of it at first, it continued, and on Monday a physician was called in. Nothing could be done, however, to check it until the following Saturday, when sleep overcame the malady, in this state she soon became unconscious and died Sunday morning.

At the Polson Works, Owen Sound, things are being put in shape for the laying of the blocks for the keel of the new boat. The new steamer will soon be ready to slide into the water, if Capt. Canan can only get that dirt thrown out. The dredge is doing immense work now and keeps things fairly "humping." The first cut is completed, and one can stand and look down into about fifteen feet of clear water where the dredge has been. The soil seems very solid, and there dosen't seem to be a bit of slip even at the shore.

On Friday last, Duncan McMillan, an employee at the Glen Mills, in Sarawak, about six miles from Owen Sound, met with an accident which deprived him of his right hand. The man who was employed at the edging machine was called away for an hour to attend a sick person at his house, and McMillan took his place, and was in the act of clearing a piece of edging from the side of the gauge, when his hand came in contact with the saw, which resulted in summary amputation at the wrist. Dr. Brown was called in, and is attending the unfortunate man, who is doing as well as can be expected. [O. S. Times.

Saturday was an unlucky day for Tinsmith's horses in Mt. Forest. In the middle of the day Mr. Thornhill had to make a bee to pull a two-year-old colt of his out of a cistern into which it had walked. At six o'clock when Mr. H. Welton went to put his valuable three year old colt up for the night, it was missing and search led to the startling discovery that the unfortunate brute had got through the fence into the adjoining lot, which is a vacant one belonging to Mr. W. H. Jones, and had fallen down a forty-foot well, which had only been covered with loose boards. The animal was, of course, killed, and was left in the well till Monday afternoon when it was with some difficulty hoisted up. The colt was a promising one which could not have been bought for $100.—[Mt. Forest Rep.

HARDON SCOTTIE.

On Thursday last fifteen counties and two cities in the Dominion voted on repeal of the Scott Act, all of which rejected it by large majorities. These counties and towns were: Guelph, St. Thomas, Brant, Frontenac, Lanark, Addington, Northumberland, Ontario, Victoria, Carleton, Kent, Lennox, Lincoln, Durham, Peterboro, Wellington and Colchester. This gives the coup de grace to the Scott Act. The temperance party will now press for total prohibition pure and simple, and perhaps after all, defeat of the above measure will prove but a stepping stone toward the great end.

Lord Lonsdale, the young English blood who got into difficulty with a pretty English actress a few years ago, has been taking an extended excursion towards the north pole during the past year. He got as far as Banks Land in 75 degrees north. This is a large island to the west of Melville Sound. Lord Lonsdale went northward with a view to the furthering of scientific knowledge, and it is probable that his object may be attained in a manner somewhat unlooked for, as he considers that he has proved the possibility of reaching the north pole by dog team, and Alphonse Leduc, the halfbreed who accompanied Lord Lonsdale part of the way to the Arctic, says that with funds and material he can get there. His idea is to go overland by sled. He thinks that with 300 men a line of communication, for supplies north and news south, could be maintained without great difficulty. Headquarters would be on the peninsula of Boothia, twelve days by courier from the nearest telegraph to Winnipeg. Leduc will attempt to interest a number of newspapers to get them to back him. It is possible that Government aid will be asked. Leduc goes from Winnipeg to New York within a day or two. If Mr. Leduc's scheme materializes we may yet know whether the north pole is made from a walrus tooth or an open sea.

Another American bank cashier, this time from Minnesota, has brought $100,000 of First National Bank money into Canada. This influx of cash to Canada from American monetary institutions is another great source of income which we would lose if the two countries were joined in one. Oh, no! Annexation is N. G. so long as American money comes rolling in at the present rate.

Rev. Mr. Dobbin, Presbyterian minister of Caledon East, was accused by certain individuals of some nameless crime, and tried before a bench of magistrates at Brampton on Monday, when he was fully acquitted of the charges. Mr. Dobbin occupied the Presbyterian pulpit in Flesherton on one occasion last fall. His friends are pardonably jubilant over [illegible] victory.

The Globe printed a picture on Saturday which it said was Rev. Hugh Johnston of Toronto. Had they said it was a photograph of Mtesa, king of Uganda, we would not have doubted its accuracy for a moment. But we have seen Mr. Johnston and will swear to the fact that he is no blackamoor with frightened hair as the Globe represents him.

The latest information is to the effect that the London Times is in rather an unenviable position. Not one cent of counsels' fees in the great Parnell inquiry case has been paid. The Times has to face an expenditure of £50,000 for law expenses and another £50,000 for libels. That sum would knock several Canadian papers into a cocked hat.

The state of Illinois is a pork state, and the Legislature of that state is passing a bill which provides that "Groundhog Day" shall hereafter be observed as a legal holiday. This falls on April 14. The state of Illinois goes the whole hog or none on holidays. Chicago will on that day fight her gastronomic battles with pork sausages and pig à la dynamite, and her own pork king will Armour with ammunition.

The Evangelical Alliance of the Dominion are preparing a petition to her most gracious majesty, Queen Victoria, setting forth the iniquitous results which must eventuate from the passage of the Jesuit Bill, and praying for her intervention in the matter.

The Cardwell election protest case will go on, Mr. Stubbs having deposited the $1000 required by Judge Street at Osgoode Hall on Monday. Date for trial has not yet been set.

A Picture of Sir. John

Sir. John A. Macdonald is thus referred to in the forthcoming April Cosmopolitan, where his portrait is the striking frontispiece of an excellent article on "The Canadian Legislature": When he shakes his head in a laughing passage-of arms, his long hair sways to and fro upon his shoulders, like the mane of an old lion—the 'Grand Old Man' of the Dominion, and one of perhaps a dozen of the world's greatest personalities of to-day. The most striking feature of his face, into which a stranger could not take the merest glimpse without becoming immediately impressed with the fact that he was in the presence of a great man, is his eyes, which are as keen and as full of vitality and observation as those of a stripling of twenty. In his place in the House nothing escapes him, as he sits through the debates until the small hours with unflagging interest and an endurance really remarkable. He is tall and erect, and bears himself with something of military alertness. In his dress he is most scrupulous. He generally wears a black diagonal morning coat and vest, and a collar of the Gladstone shape. Sometimes, however, he appears in a tail-less and jaunty Bohemian velvet coat; but there is one peculiarity of his dress which he seldom varies. He has a penchant for bright red London ties, and, except when in evening dress, rarely wears any other hue. Several people have endeavored to discover the secret of Sir. John's London tie-maker, but in vain; the genius remains an interesting mystery.

The Past.

For six years I have labored to establish a living business on the basis of honorable dealing with all—handling reliable goods at fair prices, and endeavoring to give "value received" every time goods are exchanged for money, note or credit. I have been "thrust" into something of success by the genuine support of a large section of "Central Grey" which would not have come if "undeserved."

The Present

Being fully established on the above lines, and having a very complete stock in all regular jewelers' lines, I shall expect and endeavor to still deserve the confidence and support of all past patrons, and will hope to gain new ones as 1889 rolls along.

The Future.

I trust to be able this year to keep my stock even better assorted for customers to select from. Will continue to buy from A 1 firms at closest possible prices, and offer all buyers reliable watches, etc., at "bed rock" prices. A call solicited. Goods and work warranted.

HONORED IN DEATH.

Gladstone's Noble Tribute to the Memory of Bright.

THE UNIVERSAL FEELING VOICED.

Interesting Reminiscences of the Great Commoner's Remarkable Career.

A last (Friday) night's cablegram from London says: The session of the House of Commons this evening was devoted to eulogies of John Bright.

When Wm. Henry Smith rose to speak all the members doffed their hats. Mr. Smith described Mr. Bright as a man of thorough honesty of purpose and great energy of character. If there was any defect in his character it was the intensity of his advocacy of the principles that he had adopted. If for a time he parted from his old associates under a strong sense of duty there was no trace of anger or of personal animosity left. He would go down to the grave followed by the affection and sorrow of the country.

MR. GLADSTONE'S EULOGY.

Mr. Gladstone, upon rising, was received with cheers. He said: Mr. Bright has been to a very remarkable degree happy in the moment of his removal from among us. He lived to see the triumph of almost every great cause to which he specially devoted his heart and mind. He has established a special claim to the admiration of those from whom he differed through his long political life by marked concurrence with them upon the prominent and dominant question of the hour. (Hear, hear.) But though Mr. Bright came to be separated from the great bulk of the Liberals on the Irish question on no single occasion has there been any word of disparagement. I acknowledge that I have not through my whole political life fully embraced the character of Mr. Bright and the value of that character to the country. I was one of those who did not agree with the particular views he and some of his friends took of the Crimean contest, but felt profoundly and never ceased to think what must have been the moral elevation of men who, nurtured all their lives in the temple of popular approval, could, at a moment's notice, consent to part with the whole of that favor they enjoyed, which opponents might think the very breath of their nostrils. (Hear, hear.) They accepted undoubted unpopularity, for that war commanded the enormous approval of the people. Amongst other gifts Mr. Bright was delighted to be one of the chief guardians of the purity of the English tongue. (Hear, hear.) He was enabled as an Englishman profoundly attached to his country, the tongue of the people being to him almost an object of worship, to preserve the purity of the language of Shakespeare and Milton. (Cheers.) Everybody is aware that office had no attractions for him, but few can be aware what extra efforts were required to induce him to become a servant of the Crown.

IN THE CRISIS OF 1868,

when the fate of the Irish Church hung in the balance, it was my duty to propose to Mr. Bright that he become a Minister. I never undertook so difficult a task. From 11 o'clock at night until 5 o'clock in the morning we steadily debated the subject. It was only at the last moment that he found it possible to set aside the repugnance he felt at doing anything that might in the eyes of any one, even of the more ignorant class of his countrymen, appear to detract in the slightest degree from that lofty independence of character which I have mentioned. It was my happy lot to unite so many attractive qualities. If I had to dwell upon them alone, I should present a dazzling picture to the world. It was a happier lot to teach moral lessons by simplicity, casuistry, unfailing courage and constancy of life, thus presenting a combination of qualities that carried us to a higher atmosphere. (Hear, hear.) His sympathies were not strong only, but active—not sympathies awaiting calls to be made upon them, but sympathies of a man seeking objects upon which to bestow the inestimable advantages of

ELOQUENCE AND COURAGE.

In Ireland when support of the Irish cause was rare; in India when support of the native cause was rarer still; in America at the time when Mr. Bright, foreseeing the ultimate issue of the great struggle of 1861, stood as the representative of an exceedingly small portion of the educated community of the country, although undoubtedly representing a large part of the national sentiment—(hear, hear)—in all these cases Mr. Bright went far outside the necessities of his calling. Whatever touched him as a man of the great Anglo Saxon race, whatever touched him as a subject, obtained unasked his sincere, earnest and enthusiastic aid. (Hear, hear). All cases having his powerful advocacy made a distinct advance in the estimation of the world and distinct progress toward triumphant success. Thus it has come about that he is entitled to a higher eulogy than is due to success. Of mere success, indeed, he was a conspicuous example. In intellect he might claim a most distinguished place. But his character lay deeper than intellect, deeper than eloquence, deeper than anything that can be described or that can be seen upon the surface. The supreme eulogy that is his due is that

HE ELEVATED POLITICAL LIFE

to the highest point, to a loftier standard than it had ever reached. He has bequeathed to his country a character that cannot only be made a subject for admiration and gratitude but—and I do not exaggerate when I say it—that can become an object of reverential contemplation. In the encomiums that came from every quarter there is not a note of disonance. I do not know any statesman of my time who had the happiness of receiving, on removal from this passing world, the honor of approval at once so enthusiastic, so universal and so unbroken. (Hear, hear.) Yet no one could better dispense with the tributes of the moment, because the triumphs of his life were triumphs recorded in the advance of his country and of its people. His name is indelibly written in the annals of time and on the hearts of the great and overspreading race to which he belonged, whose wide extension he rejoiced to see, and whose power and prominence he believed to be full of promise and glory for the best interests of mankind.

Mr. Gladstone resumed his seat amid much subdued cheering.

OTHER TRIBUTES.

Lord Hartington referred to the noble words of Mr. Gladstone as fully expressive of the veneration of the country for the memory of Mr. Bright. He said that Mr. Bright was not a statesman versed in the arts of government and capable of conducting the complicated affairs of a great nation. It was the high standard of his political conduct and the intensity of his convictions that gave his eloquence unrivalled force.

Justin McCarthy, who in the absence of Mr. Parnell spoke for the Irish party, associated their sentiments with those expressed in the noble speech of Mr. Gladstone. He said that the memory of the Irish people endured and it carried them back to the time when Mr. Bright championed their cause. He therefore claimed the right of Ireland to lay an immortelle upon the great Englishman's grave. (Cheers).

Mr. Chamberlain said that throughout his political life Mr. Bright's relations toward his electors were those of entire independence, Mr. Bright holding that his service conferred an obligation upon the constituency.

VICTORIA AND CHRISTINA.

England's Widowed Queen Visits the Widowed Spanish Queen — Victoria's Cordial Reception.

A San Sebastian cable says: Queen Victoria arrived here yesterday, accompanied by Prince and Princess Henry of Battenberg and members of her suite, including Lady Churchill. Sir Francis Ford, British Ambassador at Madrid, and representatives of the Queen Regent Christina, met the royal visitor at Irun. The Queen was greeted with salvos of artillery from the Lemotta citadel and volleys from the troops that lined the route to the royal castle. The Queen Regent, accompanied by the Duchess of Bailen and the Countess Lartago, was waiting at the station with numerous officials and deputations. The Queen kissed Christina on both cheeks. The two queens entered a state carriage and drove to the castle, attended by a brilliant military escort. As the royal carriage passed between the long lines of troops the military bands played the national anthems and the populace cheered enthusiastically. In a second carriage were Prince and Princess Henry of Battenberg, while five others were occupied by Spanish officials and members of Victoria's suite. Luncheon was served at the castle. Afterwards the party were driven to the town hall, where a sumptuous throne had been erected. Here Victoria formally received the Mayor and afterwards witnessed a series of basque dances and games in the square from the windows of the town hall. She was heartily cheered when she appeared upon the balcony. The party at length drove to the railway station, where Victoria and Christina exchanged affectionate adieus. At the last moment, however, the Queen Regent, with her suite, entered Victoria's carriage and accompanied Her Majesty to Irun, where farewells were again exchanged.

"Clutch" Donohue Dead.

A Kingston despatch says: John Donohue, better known as "Clutch," died yesterday morning at L'Hotel Dieu. He had been a convict in the Penitentiary for some time, but last Friday was pardoned and released, as death was imminent from blood disease that manifested itself in ulcerating sores all over his body. He was a man of large frame, and about 53 years of age. He was sentenced at Welland in 1885 for larceny and receiving stolen money. At the prison he acted as assistant in the mill, and was a handy man. He was healthy until some time ago, when blood disease began gradually to develop, and about five weeks ago he was compelled to go to the prison hospital. His wife was sent for, and she remained with him until death. On Saturday he was removed to L'Hotel Dieu. As soon as the change was made Donohue brightened up, and was quite satisfied that he would recover. Once, since then, he made an effort to get upon his feet, but it was so exhausting that he speedily gave up the attempt. He died quite penitent, and his remains were removed to Fort Erie for burial. Donohue was born in New York.

PREVENTION of disease is both rational and scientific. If one knows the causes of most diseases, and can remove that cause, the diseases must disappear. Prof. Wm. H. Thompson, of the University of the City of New York, says: "More adults are carried off in this country by chronic kidney disease than by any other one malady except consumption." The majority per cent. of all diseases are caused by unsuspected kidney poisoned blood. The late Dr. Dio Lewis, in speaking of Warner's Safe Cure, said over his signature: "If I found myself the victim of a serious kidney trouble, I would use Warner's Safe Cure."

ONTARIO LEGISLATURE.

TORONTO, March 8.—Sir Alex. Campbell, notwithstanding his illness, prorogued the Legislature this afternoon in the presence of a not over-crowded chamber. The same simplicity of ceremonial witnessed at the opening characterized the closing day. Members of the Government, officials and representatives of the professions were there, but the exodus of members was apparent. Mr. Mowat, as usual, was the centre of an admiring throng before and after the ceremony. The following is the speech delivered by His Honor in closing the House:

Mr. Speaker and Gentlemen of the Legislative Assembly,

In bringing to a close another session of the Legislative Assembly, I desire to recognize the earnestness and zeal with which you have devoted yourselves to the work of legislation.

The measure which you have adopted for developing the unsettled portions of the Province by means of colonization railways meets with my hearty approval. I am glad to believe that the revenues accruing from the opening up of the mineral and other lands, through which the projected railways will pass, and the profits to be derived from the sale of certain classes of timber not at present marketable, will alone reimburse to the Provincial Treasury the expenditure to be incurred in carrying into effect the policy which has received your sanction.

I am glad to give my assent to the Bill for creating the new electoral district of Nipissing. The large territory embraced in that district and the new settlements springing up within its borders entitle the district to a voice in the Legislative Assembly. The effect will doubtless be to direct public attention more fully than before to this important section of the Province.

The measure which you have passed for affording an expeditious and simple remedy for determining the claims of settlers in the new districts for damages to their lands by flooding, will, I trust, materially aid in accomplishing the object desired.

By the Voters' Lists Act and the Franchise Amendment Act you have afforded increased facilities for enabling every qualified elector to have his name placed upon the assessment roll and voters' list.

The important amendments made to the Shops Regulation Act, the Factory Act and the Workmen's Compensation for Injuries Act will, I feel assured, be appreciated by all those who are concerned in the beneficial operation of these laws.

I am much gratified with the measures you have adopted for the improvement of the Pharmacy Act, the Act respecting the study of anatomy and the Free Libraries Act. Each of these Acts deal with important educational interests, and the amendments you have made cannot fail to exercise a salutary effect upon the special departments to which they respectively relate.

I have assented with pleasure to the Bills you have submitted to me for the further improvement of our municipal and assessment laws.

I thank you for the liberal appropriations which you have made for the public service. The supplies which you have voted will be expended with prudence and in the public interest.

A SCHOOL TEACHER STUCK.

His Amours and Irregularities Cost Him $5,000

An interesting breach of promise case will come up before the Toronto Assizes in a few days. The defendant is a school teacher named John Archibald Watson, who has been teaching in Maple village, York county, and the plaintiff is Miss Alice Kirby, the daughter of a Vaughan farmer. The defendant is accused of breach of promise of marriage and seduction, and the damages are set at $6,000. Watson asserts that he is not guilty. After being arrested on writs of capias by the county constables he was taken to the sheriff's office, but was immediately bailed out by his friends.

A Toronto despatch says: The breach of promise case of Alice Kirby and John A. Watson was begun yesterday afternoon. The defendant is a school teacher in the township of Vaughan, and is the son of a comparatively wealthy farmer. The plaintiff is the daughter of a farmer of Vaughan township. She and defendant attended Richmond High School together. It appears that Watson was received in Miss Kirby's family as a prospective son-in-law, and the engagement was commonly spoken of in the neighborhood. The result of the intimacy was that on April 15th, 1888, as plaintiff claims, defendant accomplished her ruin. About a month after that he began to be less assiduous in his attentions to her. He began to pay attentions to other young ladies, and, finally, to discover exactly how matters were Miss Kirby wrote him asking him to return her presents and to come to see her. In answer he sent a somewhat insulting letter denying that they had ever been engaged and declaring that he was not the author of her disgrace. The marriage was never concluded, and the plaintiff's troubles reached a climax when she became a mother. She sued for $7,000 damages. The plaintiff, a neatly dressed but careworn woman of 23, was the first witness. No witnesses were called for the defence. The jury retired at 4.30, and at 5.40 returned a verdict of $7,000 for the plaintiff. As $5,000 was the sum claimed by the plaintiff, judgment was given for that sum only.

A Bad American Dollar.

A new counterfeit dollar is being circulated rather freely in the Western States. It will probably soon make its appearance in Canada. The bad coin is a good imitation and liable to deceive the unwary, being made of brass with a thin coating of electro-plate. It rings much like the genuine, but a little sharper. At a casual glance it has the appearance of having been carried in numberless pockets, the stars and statue of liberty looking much worn, but the date, 1861, is sharply cut and fails to carry out this impression. The depressed parts of the two sides are slightly off color, looking blue when placed beside a genuine coin.

A Personal Call Solicited.

"I do not write for money," said a poetess, proudly, to the editor—"I write for love." "Oh, do you?" he replied, heartlessly. "Well, don't write for it any more; anyhow, not to this office. Come down after it yourself, and if we've got any to spare you can take it along with you. Tra-le-la, Birdie."

The demand for large stones for sidewalks exceeding sizes for ordinary flat cars has led the New York Central to build a special car for their transportation. An ordinary flat car will carry a stone only 10 feet in width, while this one will carry a stone 26 feet long and 15 feet 4 inches wide.

SAYS Prof. Hadley: "The speed of railroad trains is restricted within three theoretical limits: First, a physical limit of 80 miles an hour, beyond which it is found impossible for a train to hold the track; second, an operating limit of 60 miles an hour, which practical experience has found trains cannot run without much damage to life; third, a commercial limit of 30 miles per hour, at which, all things considered, it is found most economical to run a train."

A WORK is now in progress in which all English churchmen will feel an interest. It is the preparation of a photographic fac-simile of the original manuscript of the Prayer Book which for about two centuries and a quarter has been in use in the Church of England. This liturgy dates from the days of Charles II., when, having received the sanction of convocation, it was confirmed by the Act of Uniformity, to which royal assent was given in 1662. The veritable manuscript of the book was attached to the roll on which the Act was engrossed, and for about a hundred and fifty years the two were preserved together in an ancient tower near the Chapter House of Westminster Abbey.

THE promoters of the Australian Cross-Continent Railway, which is to connect Victoria and South Australia with Western Australia, have received the co-operation of the Western Australian Government. It is expected that the construction of the new road will require ten years. As the terms of the contract are very liberal, the contractors of the road ought not to grumble at the length of time required in completing the enterprise, for they have agreed to build the road for 20,000 acres of land from the Government for every mile of line built. In other words, as the road, when completed, will be nearly 800 miles long, they will in time own an estate equal in size to one quarter of the territory of Victoria.

NEWS of a curious and unique discovery comes to hand. Amongst some old papers a genuine likeness of John Bunyan as he appeared in his prison cell at Bedford has just been discovered, for which the owner demands 1,000 guineas. The National Portrait gallery does not possess a likeness of this world-renowned author, hence the "find" should attract public attention. There appears to be no doubt about the genuine nature of the portrait. Assuming the authenticity of the work, the natural thing seems to be that it should be secured for the national collection before it is annexed by our enterprising American cousins, and disappears into some finance king's collection. The portrait is in possession of a gentleman residing in Hackney.

AN exceedingly amusing report upon Western women has been presented to the Chinese public by a travelled Chinese mandarin. As might be supposed, he is surprised beyond measure at the position and treatment of women in Europe, which is so extraordinary that "even a husband may perform any menial task in his wife's presence and no one will laugh at him." The most amusing part of his letter, however, is that in which he endeavors to explain to the benighted Celestials the nature of a kiss. The Chinese never kiss; they do not know how, any more than the Swedish ladies are said to have known how to kiss before the arrival of Bulstrode Whitlocke, who went on a mission from Cromwell to the Swedish Court during the Commonwealth. It is, therefore, somewhat difficult to explain to the Chinese what kissing, as practised in the West, consists of; he, however, is a bold man, and describes it as follows: "It is," he says, "a form of courtesy which consists in presenting the lips to the lower part of the chin and making a sound." Again: "Children when visiting their seniors apply their mouth to the left or right lips of the elder with a smacking noise." It is to be feared that this matter-of-fact description of the process is hardly likely to lead to its naturalization in the Middle Kingdom.

A QUERY.

What "Subscriber" Would Like to Know.

We have recently received a letter from one of our well-known subscribers upon a subject which we prefer to publish for the perusal of our readers, anticipating that in so doing some one will relieve us of the responsibility of answering "Subscriber's" questions. Here is the letter:

"My Dear Editor.—For several years past I have been the recipient of several pamphlets issued from time to time by Messrs. H. H. Warner & Co., of Rochester, N.Y., which, in addition to containing an extensive treatise upon kidney disease, its origin, usual symptoms and growth, also includes numerous testimonials from parties whose fac-simile signatures are attached thereto, attesting the statement that they have been individually relieved by the use of Warner's Safe Cure, which is prepared by the above firm, for the use of persons so afflicted. Now, Mr. Editor, I would like to know if the statements made by these parties who testify to the great good which Warner's Safe Cure has done them, can be relied upon. They seem honest enough from the way they read. "Warner's Safe Cure saved my life after the doctors had given me up," says John Doherty, 133 N. Main street, Concord, N. H. "I was given up to die with Bright's Disease of the kidneys. The doctors said they could do nothing for me. A friend advised me to take Warner's Safe Cure, and my family consider me as given back from the grave," says Mrs. Carrie A. Fry, of Wathena, Kas. Dr. L. B. Rice, of Hanover, C. H., Va., says that Warner's Safe Cure cured him of Bright's Disease.

It strikes me that there is a good deal of sense in the claim which those parties make that the doctors are treating too many persons for wrong causes, and that oftentimes people are treated for consumption, brain, heart and nervous disorders when they are suffering from kidney disease which should be treated, as they say, by the use of Warner's Safe Cure, and as a result, when disease is first removed therefrom, that which is supposed to be disease in the lungs or other organs will disappear. Many of my neighbors tell me that this remedy has done much good for them—more good than their doctors. If kidney disease is the real cause of so many other diseases why, Mr. Editor, don't the people who are afflicted with sickness insist upon a more careful inquiry being made, in order that the true cause may be ascertained, and the proper treatment given?" "SUBSCRIBER."

A FICKLE LOVER'S TRICK.

Sharp Device to Escape Paying Heavily for Breach of Promise.

A Little Valley special to the Titusville Herald says: Cause 31 on the calendar of the present term of the Circuit Court was an action brought for breach of promise of marriage, the plaintiff being Miss Sarah Easton and the defendant Fred. Samuelson. Sarah is a comely miss who has been blooming and budding on this green earth for about 22 summers. She is fair to behold, and Fred. wooed her and was accepted. Then he grew indifferent and finally avoided her. She sought legal redress. Sarah, backed by formidable counsel, duly appeared, as did also the recreant Fred. The latter, who is usually a slick appearing and faultlessly apparelled citizen, came to court with long, unkempt and uncombed hair clad in a heavy woollen shirt, a wampus and a pair of four-shilling overalls, wearing a ten pound pair of sole leather boots and altogether as unattractive in personal appearance as his ingenuity could suggest. It is told that when the fair Sarah saw him to whom she had plighted her faith in this condition she declared the world should never know from her testimony that she had ever so much as a passing acquaintance with the schemer. Negotiations were at once opened for a settlement, which was speedily arrived at, and the wounded affections were healed with a $100 plaster. It is further said that Fred's sharp counsel had advised his appearance at court in the manner and dress in which he came.

Death Preferred to Indigestion.

Death was preferable to indigestion to Ernest Boethig, who was found dead in bed at his home, 252 McIlwain street, yesterday, with a bullet in his head. In one of his pockets was found this letter, written in German:

MY DEAR WIFE: I for several I have nothing to live for. All goes to my boy Karl. The last bread you made was very heavy.

Boethig and his wife did not live very happily together, as the letter shows, and on the 19th inst. they quarrelled, and the husband threw a flat-iron at his wife. He then gave her a $20 gold piece and drove her from his house. Special officers Slater and Keegan broke into the house yesterday afternoon and found Boethig's body in bed propped up with pillows, and in his lap lay a large revolver. Beside the body was a picture of Boethig and his wife as they appeared on their wedding day. The remnants of a meal were on the kitchen table and conspicuous among the articles barely touched was some home-made bread, evidently part of the batch referred to in Boethig's last letter. He had eaten it, though it killed him.—Philadelphia Record

THE OLD SAILOR'S YARN.

Well I had a scare once in my life that I hope will never be repeated, and it's a wonder I didn't turn gray right then and there.

I married a western girl and we came to New York to live. It wasn't such a crowded place as it is to-day, but had its green lanes in some parts of it and even meadows. I was followin' the sea in those days, as I am now, and I thought Sally would be more contented in a lively city while I was gone away on long voyages.

It was hard work sayin good bye to my wife when I started away on long trips but she said as soon as I was captain she would travel with me.

Well, I went off on a six months' voyage the year I had the terrible scare. We struck some queer outlandish ports, and I had a great pile of stuff for Sally when we turned about for home, presents that I knew she'd value.

It often used to seem as if the ship wasn't fast enough for me; as if I must jump overboard and swim. I wanted home, and I wanted Sally, as a baby wants its mother. So you may judge if I lost time in getting ashore when once we reached New York. None of us did, for that matter, but I reckon I was first. I had my bundles under my arm and my pay in my pocket. I'd oiled my hair and I wore my shore clothes. My hands were as brown as an Indian's, with sun and wind and I guess my face was about the same color. But if I looked as I felt I looked happy. With the motion of the ship beneath my feet yet, I took my way toward my home, looking out for Sally all the way, for if she knew the ship was in she'd surely come to meet me. Not a sign of her did I see, though, and I came to the corner of my street—Norfolk was its name—with a queer little fear in my heart that made me pause and hardly dare to turn it—and then I took the step and saw a little crowd about the door of my home, and before it—oh good heaven! a hearse—black and awful, and a carriage before my house. "Yes, yes—but," says I to myself "yes it might stand there and not be from there. Courage, Jack! God wouldn't do that to you. Not He. Have faith—have trust! Was ever there a night you didn't pray He'd bring you back safe to Sally, and do you think He won't answer you? Courage, Jack!" And then I staggered on and stood among the people and my door was open and a man—serious, oldish, kind—took hold of my arm and led me aside.

"Who is dead?" I asked.

"I don't know," said he.

I took courage at that, for if it was my Sally surely he'd know her—surely.

"It's a sailor's wife," he added. [illegible] there. Last night a woman [illegible] "There's a case of cholera at No. ——," I went. Folks are apt to get frightened at nothing, but I went in a hurry. It was cholera. I did all I could for her but she died. The neighbors [illegible]

[illegible]

At [illegible] the doctor put me in the carriage [illegible] how I saw the earth cover the [illegible] I hope I was dying, but [illegible] in the carriage, and I stood at my own desolate door. The doctor [illegible] and he told me all that must be done before the place would be fit to live in, but I did not care for life. I wanted to die, and I turned faint again and the good man was loath to leave me, and so we stood, neighbors peering at us through the shutters as I knew, when suddenly I saw a vision.

I had just been to her funeral, but there stood Sally looking at me. She was dressed in white, with a little blue bonnet on her head, and spirit though I knew she must be, looked fresh and young and bright. I stared at her. The cry I gave rang through the street and she flew to me. Ghost or no ghost, I held her fast. She was warm and soft in my arms. She kissed me and I kissed her and cried:

"If I've gone crazy, let me stay so, for Sally has come back to me somehow." And for all that had come and gone, it was Sally and not her ghost, either.

If my life depended on it I couldn't tell you just how she made me understand, or just how I made her understand—I guess the doctor did it—but this is what had happened: The cholera breaking out, Sally's old folks wouldn't let her stay in the city and took her out with them, and just at that time Sally hears of a young woman, mighty poor and mighty down-hearted, who was waiting for news of her husband's ship. So she says to her: "There's a house empty; I want no rent; you're welcome until I need to live there again." And it was this poor soul that had died there.

As for her husband, his ship was lost and all hands with it; so mayhap they met in heaven; and it was best.

At all events we're made so that we must think of our own first, and I was glad—the Lord only knows how glad—with Sally in my arms again. We're together yet, old folks now, but happy with our children about us.

A Case that Dims the Record of the Proudest Knights of Old.

The voice of the young man had a tremulous vibrant quality, and a glow like that of a June sunset spread over his face, as he took the vacant seat by the side of the young woman and greeted her joyfully.

"This is an unexpected pleasure, Miss [illegible]," he said. "I did not know you were on the train. I am not presuming too much, I hope, in rejoicing in the anticipation of a delightful trip instead of the long, tiresome journey of half a day that I had resigned myself to suffer when I came aboard."

"Certainly not, Mr. Winterbottom," she replied, and the observant young man noted an increasing quickness in the fluttering movements of the feathers and thingmadiddles on the travelling hat of his fair companion not due altogether to the jar of the train.

"Her heart is beating faster," he said to himself, but even in the rapture that thrilled his frame and tingled to the end of his fingers at this discovery he felt he had taken a sneaking advantage of her and learned something he had no right as yet to know.

For months Cyrus Winterbottom had carried in his heart the image of the lovely girl who now sat by his side. For months he had hoped that the time and the opportunity might come when he—but let us not anticipate.

Their Glory Departing.

Recent travellers among the Rocky Mountains of British Columbia say the beauty of the mountains is being greatly impaired by forest fires, that leave only blackened trunks where magnificent timber had spread over large areas. Cinders from locomotives along the Canadian Pacific and the carelessness of mining prospectors kindle the [illegible] trees, which burn with extraordinary fury, often eating out even the roots, and leaving nothing but ashes. Capt. Wharton says that those who wish to see all the landscape glories of this region must visit it soon, before they are robbed of half their charm by the terrible fires, the smoke of which last summer often shut out the view of the mountains entirely. Mr. Green thinks that the fate of all the timber along the railroad is sealed. Probably no part of this continent has rivalled Washington Territory and British Columbia in the grandeur of their pine forests, and it is not a pleasing spectacle to contemplate the destruction of this towering timber, which not only adorns the landscape, but could be made of the utmost utility.

Playing at Hanging With a Fatal Result.

Albert Cundall, aged 15, met with his death at Leeds, England, the other night while playing at hanging. He had been reading a sensational tale, in which the hero was suspended to a tree, and is saved by a beautiful maiden just as life is about to leave him. It is believed that the deceased thought that if he tried the experiment he would be saved in a similar manner.

EDITOR'S BACK STAIRS."

The Interesting Views of the Late Dr. J. G. Holland.

The columns of the newspapers appear to be flooded with proprietary medicine advertisements. As we cast our eye over them, it brings to mind an article that was published by the late Dr. Holland in Scribner's Monthly. He says: "Nevertheless it is a fact that many of the best proprietary medicines of the day were more successful than many physicians, and most of them it should be remembered were at first discovered or used in actual medical practice. When however, any shrewd person, knowing their virtue, and foreseeing their popularity, secures and advertises them, then in the opinion of the bigoted, all virtue went out of them."

Is not this absurd?

This great man appreciated the real merits of popular remedies, and the absurdity of those that decried them because public attention was called to the article and the evidence of their cures.

Some Sort of Slips.

"I beg your pardon, madam, but you are sitting on my hat." [illegible] "Oh, pray excuse me. I thought it was my husband's," was the unexpected reply. In another instance of conjugal amenities, a wife said to her husband: "I saw Mrs. Becker this morning and she complained that on the occasion of her last visit you were so rude to her that she thought she must have offended you." "Nothing of the kind," he answered. "On the contrary, I like her very much, but it was rather dark at the time and when I entered the room at first I thought it was you." "Poor John—he was a kind and forbearing husband," sobbed John's widow on her return from the funeral. "Yes," said a sympathizing neighbor, "but it is all for the best. You must try to comfort yourself, my dear, with the thought that your husband is at peace at last."

Biblical Curiosities.

There is no date from beginning to end in the Bible. It comprises some sixty documents and is supposed to have been written by about forty men. Fifty-four miracles are recorded in the Old and fifty one in the New Testament, total 105. The shortest verse in the Old Testament is "Remember Lot's wife." There is one in the New Testament as short as John xi 35, in point of words, but not in letters, viz. Thessalonians v. 16, "Rejoice evermore." Then there are two chapters in the Bible alike verbatim, and one book, Esther, in which the Deity is not mentioned.

A BAGFUL OF RODENTS

Strange Tale of Rats, Hazel Nuts and Nautical Law.

Capt. Crosby, of a Nova Scotia barque now unloading at pier No. 13, East River, is a jolly old sea dog, well known as a veteran of the coast trade, says the New York Evening Sun. About [illegible] years of age, broad-shouldered and heavily built, his face thickly covered with a black beard, the captain is easily the ideal skipper of the sea.

"On a recent voyage to New York," said the captain, "I carried a cargo consisting in part of some 500 bags of hazel nuts. When we made port the owner of the nuts came on board. I assured him of their safety, and together we went through the ship. Everything was all right until we came to the nuts. Imagine our surprise to see the bags torn and the nuts lying scattered in heaps here and there. A small hole had been gnawed in the end of each nut and the meat extracted as clean as a whistle. The work of rats, of course.

Doors will be open to the public till the case is gone through with, then the arbitrators to be left alone to make their award.

Heavy Horses.

Last week The Advance published an item in reference the weight of horses belonging to Mr. John Adams and Mr Roderick Stewart. Since then we have heard of two young animals which discount the horses mentioned to a considerable extent. Mr. Samuel Wakely is the owner of a Garfield colt rising 3 and a Derby rising 2 years, and when put on scale with harness on weigh 2,700 lbs. Further information can be had from Mr. Wakely, Inistrioge P.O. Not bad for a yearling and two years old

Minus Rig, Minus Rent.

The O.S. Times says: Landlord McInnis, of Flesherton Station, was in town on Monday looking for a young fellow who was selling sewing machines on commission in that neighborhood for one of our local agents. Having run up a hotel bill for himself and horse, and not being an expert salesman, he became "strapped" and his horse and buggy was seized last Thursday by Mr. McInnis to satisfy his claim, the young fellow being around the village until Sunday night when he broke into the stable and stole the horse and rig, and made for Owen Sound where Mr. McInnis found them. When last seen they were on the Monday afternoon train going to Shelburne where the young fellow promised to make good the claim of the hotelkeeper. The horse and rig did not belong to the agent, but were simply hired, hence the anxiety to secure possession of them from the hands of his creditor.

A Case of Hardship

A peculiar case of hardship has lately been brought to our notice. An elderly gentleman, living a mile or so from Flesherton, and who shall be nameless for the present, conceived the idea last fall of starting a general store in Flesherton, and visited Toronto with a view of purchasing a stock. He gave as security for a thousand dollars worth of goods a mortgage upon his farm and returned home. The mortgage was forwarded for the signature of his wife, but this was refused. As a result the negotiations were brought to a stand still. However, it is said the lady's wisdom did not end with her refusal to sign the mortgage, but that she also refused to allow her husband a shelter under his own roof, and drove him forth upon the charity of friends, with whom he remained all winter. It is said that when he attempted to call at his own house the doors were bolted and he was refused admission. A daughter in Washington Territory forwarded the old gentleman funds, and week before last he started for the far west. If these facts be true, and we have no cause to disbelieve them, it is a case of ingratitude which seldom falls to the lot of a father and a husband.

Open Lodge.

The Sons of Temperance gave an open lodge in their hall on Wednesday evening last which was well patronized by our citizens. The hall was uncomfortably filled Rev. Mr. Shilton, Mr. Howard and Dr. Christoe gave short addresses Miss Brown gave a reading and Miss Christoe and Miss Leitch gave a nicely rendered instrumental selection. Miss Leitch and Mrs. Blackburn gave a duet, as also did Messrs. Russell and Barnhouse. Little Miss Lena Large rendered a solo in a very pleasing manner This young lady has a voice of considerable promise. T. Hollinger gave a accordion performance which was highly appreciated. A tableau which was given would have left a much better impression upon the senses had it been given at the conclusion, so that people might have escaped the inevitable pungent fumes arising from the fire. The choking smoke rendered it necessary to raise the windows, to the detriment of those who were subject to colds. Notwithstanding this slight unpleasantness the affair was very enjoyable and redounded to the credit of the Sons of Temperance.

Mrs. Shilton in the "Creation."

There were those in Flesherton who thought we lavished too much praise upon Mrs. Shilton, of Toronto, upon her late visit here. There were those, also, who attempted to criticise Mrs. Shilton's singing in a manner which was not at all complimentary to their knowledge of music. It pleases us to recommend these persons to the following flattering notice from the Empire of Friday, which appeared in an extended notice of "The Creation" as produced at the Horticultural Gardens, in which the lady in question won enviable laurels: "Mrs. Clara E. Shilton possessed the commendable attraction of a birdlike execution, and the rendition of "And Cooing Calls the Tender Dove His Mate" awoke much spirited enthusiasm. Mrs. Shilton was correct in interpretation, and signified by her delicate expression that she was in full accord with the depth of sentiment to be conveyed. Her voice reaches a more vital part of the auditor than disinterested criticism, and this as a recognize attribute of success, is her best charm." The Globe also spoke in the highest terms of Mrs Shilton's powers as a singer.

Division Court

The Division Court held here on Friday last was one of the most interesting held for some time. There were some eighteen cases to be tried, one of which, that of Emma v. Morrow, occupied the day from opening of court until 4.30 p.m. This case was tried by a jury of five men. Morrow had rented a farm from plaintiff and vacated it at the end of a year, claiming that he had entered into the agreement through misrepresentation, and plaintiff sued for the second year's rent A large number of witnesses were heard on both sides. Certain points only were given to the jury to decide, which took them two hours to complete. The finding was handed in in writing, and the judge reserved a final decision until May 1. The total sum claimed by plaintiff amounted to $144.30, including certain damages

The noted organ case of Connell v. Brander was again postponed until next court, June 5, when it will be first on the list.

Another peculiar and somewhat interesting case was that of Atwell v. Fisher. Plaintiff sold defendant hay in bulk, and the defence put in for non-payment was that there was not as much hay in the bulk as represented. The sale, it appears, was made in a peculiar manner, by auction, the auctioneer starting the sale himself at $50, and lowering the price telling his hearers that when he had arrived at a sufficiently low figure the first man to speak would have the hay. When he had got down to twenty dollars Fisher gave the word and the hay was knocked down to him. He afterwards repudiated payment. Judgement was given for plaintiff.

A number of timber cases were tried. Sanderson v. Holmes, Maxwell v. Holmes, Tuck v. Holmes and Connors v. Holmes were all decided in favor of plaintiffs. These were all timber claims. That of Lattimore v. McIntyre was also a case arising out of services rendered in timbering. Mr. Lattimore purchased timber for McIntyre and procured lodgings and board for his men and claimed $49.35 wages due. The defence was breach of contract. In deciding the case in favor of plaintiff for $25.35, Judge Lane took occasion to remark that he believed that Mr. Lattimore had filled his contract to the very letter. The reduction in claim was made through some misunderstanding as to the board bills.

Other cases of more or less importance, but which we have not space to give in full, were:

Meiklejohn v. Mathewson, Bell v. Crabb, Wills v. McDonald, Williams v. Carr (two cases), Whittam v. Herman and C.P.R. garnishees, Spratt v. Binford et al, and Johnston v. Irish were all decided in favor of plaintiffs. Mackenzie v. Martin was dismissed. Gibson v. Farwell, another timber case, went for defendant.

It was 11 o'clock at night when the court finally arose.

That Sawing Match.

To the Editor of The Advance.

DEAR SIR—Will you kindly give space for a few lines in regard to that challenge which was accepted by the parties whose names appeared in your issue of two weeks ago. The boys you know who said we never bit unless we mean business. Now Mr. Editor, I wish to refer you and all who may read this article to the fact that the challenge we sent them was limited to the 1st of April, our reason for so doing being that one of us was going away about that time. Our opponents being well aware of that fact determined to use it to their own advantage. Instead of putting up their money and naming a day and place for the race to come off, as they ought to have done, they got hold of the paper the challenge was in and they saw it dated the 14th, and that it came with the dangerous gassy article in it the 21st, so now they have an idea of their own. Like a pig in a potato patch without a ring in its nose. Thus they plan. We'll send an article in next week, and they will not see it until the 28th, and perhaps not until the 29th, and one of them is going away on the first, so they can't take us up on two day's notice, and we'll bluff them and the people will think we were not afraid of them. Very cute, boys; you understand figures. As blowing cuts a prominent figure in their physical life they cling to it with as much tenacity as if it was half the means of their existence. They must have exerted their mental vein almost beyond its capacity to conceive the above idea. It's too bad to deprive them of it, but we could not help it. They said "we never bet unless we mean business, so we thought we would see. Accordingly we sent them word to come over to Dougal Ferguson's bush on Monday, the first of April, and we put up our money in J. Campbell's hand, and when the hour (2 p.m.) arrived there were ten of the neighbors there to witness the race, and they waited until about three o'clock, but these boys who said they meant business never appeared. Perhaps the gnats crawled on again after they had brushed them off and retarded their progress. We hear they say now we did not give them notice enough, but they had the doing of that themselves and of course they meant business! Drowning men catch at straws.

THE SAWYERS.

Kimberley.

Not having seen any Kimberley items for some time I came to the conclusion your correspondent is not able just at present to write and let your readers know our little village is still flourishing.

We are pleased to learn Miss Priscilla Myles is recovering from her sickness. We hope to soon see her with us again.

Mr. R. D. Carruthers went all the way to Owen Sound the other day to get a tooth extracted. Good opening for a dentist in Kimberley.

Mr. Plewis and family are about to leave for Washington territory. We are sorry to say good bye to these friends but in their place we welcome Mr. Bishop from Quebec, who has purchased the mill belonging to Mr. Plewis. We hope he may always be as favorably impressed with our village as he is at present. Saturday evening a company gathered at the residence of Mr. Plewis and spent a pleasant evening. Mrs. Plewis was presented with a handsome set of dishes in token of the esteem in which she is held by her neighbors.

Rev. Mr. Watts is still holding special services in the Methodist Church. He is meeting with grand success.

Mr. W. Dunwoodie occupied the pulpit Sabbath evening.

A SUB CORRESPONDENT.

From our own Correspondent.

Spring has opened up and farmers commencing to plow.

Mr. H. Hurlburt, who has been away for some months, is back again in our midst. He thinks Kimberley is the best place yet.

Messrs. Stewart and Hammond are pushing the maple sugar out of the trees very fast, or at least it is coming and they are taking care of it nicely. We were informed that a deputation of about eight ladies and two or three gentlemen waited on them a few days ago for the purpose of enquiring the best methods of making taffy. They said they were well received and enjoyed a pleasant evening and went in good humor some time in the near future.

Miss P. Myles has been suffering for some time past with inflammation of the lungs. We are glad to learn that she is doing well. Mr. J. Alexander has also been suffering from a very sore throat. Glad to say he is recovering.

Mr. J. Plewis has sold his mill and other property to a gentleman from the Province of Quebec. Mr. P. is going west in a few weeks. We are sorry to part with him, but he is bound to go. We welcome Mr. Bishop, our new miller, and hope he may do well in this community.

Priceville Items.

From our own Correspondent.

Six inches of snow last week.

A flock of wild geese, numbering near fifty, arrived here on Friday afternoon from the south, and during that heavy snow storm they seemed to lose their "bearings" for they kept wandering up and down the open water of the Saugeen a mile or two north of the village, all the time uttering wild, plaintive cries. On their first approach we imagined that we heard the shepherd laddies playing "Rob Roy McGregor" with their pipes up on the mountain sides in auld Scotia.

Last week we heard little "Olem" of Balsam Valley, mourning and crying for some of the neighbor girls to take him out and feed him some taffy. We hope his wishes are gratified ere this sheet comes out.

One night last week a mink entered Mr. Alfred Hincks poultry house and slaughtered 40 hens, only leaving six or seven remaining.

Mr. W. Gray, father-in-law to W. Burt, of the Crown Hotel here, died suddenly near Feversham on Friday. His remains were taken to Orchardville on Sunday morning.

Mysterious Case.

PORT HURON, Mich., March 28. Two strangers came to Smith's Creek, about twelve miles south-west of here, by the Grand Trunk, on Tuesday evening, and engaged rooms at the Lindsay House. One was a man about 50 or 60 years of age, the other a considerably younger. The younger man was last seen [illegible] and is supposed he came into this city on the evening train. The elder man didn't appear yesterday morning. His room was broken into and the aged stranger found lying across the bed with his throat cut from ear to ear, dead. No knife was found, but some broken crockery was found in the room covered with blood, and it is thought that with the latter the deed was committed. In the pockets was found $162 in cash, but nothing to identify the dead. When the men arrived in town they asked for a Mr. Coreless. Some think Smith's Creevers are [illegible] the opinion that the man committed suicide, while others think he was foully murdered. As yet the authorities have no clue regarding the matter. Every effort is being made to locate the [illegible] companion of the dead stranger, but so far without result. In case it proves to have been murder it is very evident the object was not plunder.

ESTELLE'S INFATUATION:
A NOVEL.

"She is a very striking-looking woman, certainly," said Lady Kingshouse, who herself had her own "cachet"—and knew that she had. "But I don't think Mr. Harford so desperately epris as all that."

She did not say what "all that" meant, and no one asked.

"Ah, well, there's no saying! And there are the horses," said Lord Kingshouse, looking at the clock, "just three minutes behind time. I shall speak to Master Figgins and ask what he means by it. He must not grow unpunctual, else he will have to find a new master. Come, Delight, let us be off."

And with a nice little "Good-by, old dear," to his wife, the two left the room, and after a solemn "Behind time, Figgins" to the coachman, were soon cantering briskly along the hard metallic road on their way to the town and the Kingshouse Arms.

How beautiful the way was! The sky was as blue as the blue speedwells of spring, and the hoar frost shone in the sun like so much pencilled fret-work wrought by the Great Artificer who gives the beetle its shining green and the butterfly its softer plumes.

For a moment Lady Elizabeth forgot that other life in which she habitually dwelt—that life of suffering which she soothed of sorrow which she shared. She talked and laughed, and was as radiant as those sun lighted clouds which caught the gleam on their white fleeces, so that they dazzled the eyes which looked at them.

The earl ... in her new mood.

The villagers had time to take note and make their boorish remarks, not ... intended, ... the door of the quaint old-fashioned little inn—that "Kat ... visitor from London ... for ... [illegible]

But when they parted ... road to the town and the other to the Dower House the sun seemed to have suddenly set for Lady Elizabeth, and the blue to have dropped out of the sky. She became pale and silent, and the iridescent fountain sank once more beneath the ... of tenderness through which it had broken.

"Why, Delight, you are quite pale and silent. Are you tired?" asked the earl, as he noticed the sudden drooping and the sudden pallor.

"I think I am a little, dear," was her gentle reply.

"And yet we have not ridden so very far," he said.

"No; but we have ridden fast," she returned.

"And that comes to the same thing?"

"Yes," she said, with more meaning than she knew.

To which he flung back a cheerful word of caress in his "Poor poppet!" half lost in his horse's ringing hoofs as they cantered on to the gates of home.

CHAPTER IX.

RECONNOITRING.

Mrs. Clanricarde was essentially clever. She understood differences and profited by mistakes. Her insight was as discriminating as her touch was delicate, and she neither confounded substances nor confused experiences. To Anthony Harford she adopted a new set of tactics altogether from those she had used with Caleb Stagg. Kind, frank, hospitable, friendly, she was careful not to let the faintest shadow of a second intention appear. She sedulously kept Estelle in the background. She did not speak of her at all, and to her but rarely. She asked nothing of her that should show off her accomplishments; and it was Anthony himself who found out that she could sing sweetly and play divinely, and that her sketches were far beyond amateur average.

Was this the woman who had, as Mrs. Aspline said, flung her daughter at the head of Tom, Dick and Harry?

Anthony's heart rose and sickened as he thought of this calumny, which he tried to banish from his mind and could not. He was too jealous by nature to bear patiently the thought that some one else had filled those sweet eyes with the longing tenderness of love, that any other man had coveted what he desired and meant to make his own, that this pearl of price, this precious treasure of delight, had been mutely offered to any man alive and had been rejected. No, he would not believe this. And all the more would he not, seeing how little the mother now put her forward; and yet he, Anthony Harford, was a better match in all ways as a man and a fortune than either this consumptive artist or this enriched miner!

Always apparently occupied with Mrs. Clanricarde, Anthony used to place himself where he could see Estelle—where he could watch her pose, her hands, her hair, and how she moved, and see her as she was, perfectly natural and unembarrassed. Glad to be left alone, she did not see that she was being watched, and the new man—mother's new craze and favorite—gave her no kind of distress.

Anthony, too, made no mistakes, and did not spoil his chances by precipitation. He showed none of that hunger for an answering love which repels far oftener than it incites.

Speaking one evening of his relations with the Asplines, and how it was that he had come here on that business of the trusteeship, which he had taken over after his father's death, he chanced to mention Thorbergh as the name of the town, the district, where his place was—"Thrift, by Thorbergh," as the postal direction ran.

Mrs. Clanricarde looked up at the name.

"Thorbergh, in Loamshire?" she asked, with keen interest.

"Yes," he answered. "Do you know it?"

"George," said Mrs. Clanricarde, forgetting to answer her guest, "what do you think? Mr. Harford's place is near Thorbergh!"

"Never!" said George, with his fatuous smile. "What an extraordinary coincidence!"

"Where? In what?" asked Anthony, suddenly grave.

"Oh!" laughed Mrs. Clanricarde, "there is no great mystery in it after all. Only at Thorbergh lives a certain Mrs. Latimer, the widow of a cousin of my husband's, on whose death we shall receive a small accession of income. That is all. She must be a very old woman by now—past eighty, George, is she not?—but she lives on as these annuitants always do, and I dare say she has good ten years before her yet."

She laughed again. She did her best to laugh easily and naturally, but the tone was sharp and the effort painful and evident.

"Where does she live?" asked Anthony. "Latimer—I seem to know that name."

"At No. 3, Highstile Lane," said George with the patness of unpleasant perfectness.

"Oh, that's it," returned Anthony. "Highstile Lane belongs to me and she is one of my tenants."

"How very singular!" said Mrs. Clanricarde again; and this time her animation her pleased air was not forced. It was a link. And when one is in want of a chain, any link is better than none.

"I will go and look after her for you," said Anthony, who also was glad of that link, slender as it was. "Shall I call on her when I go back to Thrift and report on her condition?"

"Yes, do," said Mrs. Clanricarde.

"It will be a satisfaction," chimed in her husband.

"It certainly will," ... looking at Estelle ... [illegible]

[illegible]

... to a ... woman ... be ... said Estelle ... Say, Miss Clanricarde, is that the right thing to do?"

"What ...?" asked Estelle, waking from a kind of dream.

"Is it right to speak as we think?" Anthony asked again.

"Surely!" said Estelle. Then with a rapid glance at her mother she qualified her bolder assertion with a more cautious "At least I suppose so—sometimes."

Like all timid people, she was afraid of sudden question.

"I wonder if we do—any of us?" said Mrs. Clanricarde, with her philosophizing air very charming and very false.

"As much as we can, I reckon," said Anthony, but his philosophy smacked of the backwoods not of the drawing room. "It would be rather hot if we said all we thought at all times. We'd raise Cain, and that's a fact!"

"Discretion is sometimes the better part of valor," said that foolish George, a little wide of the immediate point, as he always was.

"And we have good breeding to consider," put in Mrs. Clanricarde, always mildly philosophical.

"And the policy of waiting," said Anthony, with a sudden gleam in his eyes that made the watching mother's heart leap for joy at the meaning of its light.

"Yes, waiting," she said, quietly. "'All comes to him who knows how to wait.' That is a French proverb, and a true one."

"All?" asked Anthony, with emphasis.

"All," she repeated, also with emphasis.

Estelle looked at her mother. And Anthony caught that swift flash to-night as her mother had caught it then. It stirred him with a sudden movement of jealousy and suspicion.

"Then, you think, too, that all comes to him who knows how to wait?" he asked, speaking to Estelle with a strange little touch of sternness in his voice.

"I do not know. It is to be hoped it does," she replied, not raising her eyes. "Now, dear," she added suddenly to her father; "you have spoiled the game. You cannot do it if you put the king of clubs there over the queen of spades."

"I will try. I think I can work it," said that foolish George, who at "patience," as with his investments, could never see an inch before him, and who always thought that he could work the most impossible combinations.

"The game is lost!" said Estelle, with a sigh.

The king of hearts was hemmed in so as to be useless, and the queen of spades could not be moved because of the king of clubs, which blocked her in. And that fierce, square shouldered Bluebeard of the pack suddenly looked to Estelle like Anthony Harford.

"Shall I try to straighten it out?" asked Anthony, coming to the table.

"You cannot," said Estelle, rising and leaving it.

"Do you play this game?" asked Mr. Clanricarde, still fingering the cards and trying to remove the immovable block.

"Oh, I play pretty nigh every game in the pack," said Anthony; "but these one-handed concerns are beyond me. And I do not think I should care for them."

"They are very interesting when you know them," said Mr. Clanricarde.

"I prefer an antagonist," said Anthony.

"You have an antagonist," returned the other. "Fortune, and your own want of skill and foresight."

Anthony laughed.

"My own want of skill and foresight!" he said. "I don't own up to that! I'll play with my skill and foresight against fortune or any other odds you like. But want of skill! I reckon that's not in the schedule!"

"Take care; pride goes before a fall," said that foolish George, in exactly the same words as Mrs. Aspline had used.

Anthony tossed up his head like a horse unduly checked.

"I'll follow my pride and risk the fall," he said, with a certain outburst of temper that made Mrs. Clanricarde say to herself: "That man wants careful handling. He will stand no nonsense." Soon after this Anthony took his leave, and went back to the Kingshouse Arms as if possessed by seven devils—he did not clearly know why.

CHAPTER X.

"I AT STAKE."

Let those who can explain this seeming contradiction. The longer Anthony Harford remained at Kingshouse the stronger grew his passion for Estelle and the farther off he seemed from its expression. She had the strangest power of chilling him, so that he could not speak to her tenderly, nor even look at her with that unmistakable meaning which love thinks so much golden light into a man's eyes.

This fierce turmoil in Anthony's heart began to show itself in his looks.

"If I could love Lady Elizabeth!" he often thought "she would have been the fit wife for me that other had not bewitched me. If I could love her! But it is too late now. The die is cast. I will hold Estelle in my arms as my wife, or I will kill her first, then myself!"

Meanwhile Estelle held fast by her faith in Charlie, and, without one covert look or word that her mother could take hold of, spread that spell over Anthony which froze him into silence and reduced him to that state which was like to a geyser under a glacier. She knew that if things should come to an open declaration they would not be so easily managed as with poor Caleb.

Just at this juncture Charlie Osborne suddenly ceased to write to her. She ... nothing of him and knew nothing of him. His last letter had been from Yokohama, when he said to her that he ... up at the stars and thought of her ... more beautiful ... in the sky. After that ... [illegible]

[illegible]

... But the latter ... was in good hands, and would be well looked after, and his friends at Kingshouse ... He himself had desired this letter to be written to Mrs. Clanricarde, who was adjured to break the news gently to Estelle, and to be good to his darling—always his one adored and faithfully beloved!

Here, then, was a loophole, for which Mrs. Clanricarde was sorrowfully grateful. Of course she was sorry. You cannot hear of the dangerous illness of a handsome young creature you have known all his life and not be moved in that part of your nature which goes by the name of bowels of compassion. She told her the sad news with really admirable softness of manner and undeclared, but implied, sympathy. And she did not fall foul of the headache which kept the poor girl invisible in the afternoon when Anthony Harford called and sent her to bed before her usual time to make that headache decidedly worse by weeping.

Unable to see Estelle Anthony rode off to the Dower House for Lady Elizabeth, and was comforted to find that she was at home. How deeply he revered her! how tenderly he admired her!

"You are scarce like a woman to me," he said to her to-day. "You are like one of those beautiful pagan goddesses run into the mould of an English young lady!"

She laughed a little shyly and colored with embarrassment and pleasure combined.

"The old goddesses were rather vague and vapory creatures," she said, speaking in the air, as people do who have to say something when their breast is throbbing, and their brain confused in consequence.

"I know some like to them," Anthony thinking of Estelle, "as vague, as vapory, as unattainable."

"Short of crying for the moon, what is unattainable?" she asked, thinking neither of Estelle nor of herself.

"Should be to a man, nothing," said Anthony. "In active life there would be nothing if he were strong and knew his alphabet. But when you come to say—and how she is to be approached, and how she is to be won—the scene changes, and what he has learned in the camp doesn't quite ... ve him in the drawing-room."

"It depends on the woman," said Lady Elizabeth.

"Do you believe in magic?" he asked, abruptly.

"No," she answered. "Surely not! Do you?"

"I don't quite know," he answered. "A month or so ago I would have shouted 'No' with the loudest; but now—I scarce know what to think."

There was a pause. Then Lady Elizabeth said, in rather a low voice: "I don't quite know to what you are alluding, so I cannot really answer you. I cannot touch your point."

"Oh, it's of no consequence," he answered, with a strange commingling of carelessness and desperation. "But I feel as if a spell had been cast over me somehow. To try and not succeed—to be dumb when you wish to speak—to be unable even to show what is in your heart and mind—to feel baffled and prevented and off the trail altogether—what is that, Lady Elizabeth? Seems to me like magic, somehow, to a man like myself who never shirked a danger, and never funked it when it came!"

"But are you in that state?" she asked raising her eyes in wonder.

Conscious of the broad sympathies between them she could not take this to herself. It was a state touching some one else—something that she did not know.

"Yes," he said, a little sullenly.

Again there was silence so dead that it seemed as if the very air was frozen and could not be moved.

"I should not think you could be baffled in anything, if you once fully determined to succeed," she then said, speaking with the effort of one lifting a heavy weight breaking through a strong enclosure.

His face brightened.

"You think not?" he said.

"No," she answered.

"And you advise me to perserve—to overcome the spell—to be master of myself and of fate?"

She turned as pale as the linen strip about her throat. She was conscious that she was looking into unknown depths and standing on the brink of an unfathomed pool.

"Yes," she said. "Persevere."

He got up and took both her hands in both of his.

"I will remember your advice," he said, pressing them hard while his eyes looked down into her face with unutterable tenderness unspeakable gladness. "If I come to my happiness, it will be through you and ..."

How he loved and reverenced this fair and saintly counseller at this moment! How deeply he loved her! She felt his tenderness, his love, as it might have been the sudden effulgence of the sun, and all her heart went out to him, as a flower that opened to the light.

"Now you know my secret," he said, "and now you can judge what I feel—and feel for me. And you will know what I owe to you when the time comes!"

He drew her hands up to his breast and kissed them with the most loving, the most reverent tenderness. But for her habit of self control she would have flung herself into his arms to have offered him of her own free-will more than he had claimed. But she remembered in good time that he had not said the one decisive irretrievable word, and she refrained.

"If I win her," he said again, "it will be thanks to you who have heartened me. Estelle—almost sister now, you will be my true sister then, and our happiness will be yours. God bless you, best and dearest of friends! You do not know what you have done for me!"

For a moment the earth reeled under Lady Elizabeth's feet, and she knew nothing of time or space itself save the one ... of pain. Then, with a supreme effort—the effort of a martyr at the stake who prays and does not cry—she said, in a strange and level voice: "I am glad."

And ...

CHAPTER XI.

[illegible]

... Anthony Harford ... [illegible]

... and ... when one ... as were ... at this ... as equal to ... no black ... no drought ma... itself felt.

Mrs. Latimer was the widow of a cousin of Mr. Clanricarde's who had died about ten years ago, leaving only his relict to enjoy for her lifetime—but no children to divide his modest fortune after her death. When, however, Cousin Latimer, then quite an elderly man, chose to marry a certain Miss Stone, of whom no one had ever heard—of whose birth, parentage, education, and antecedents nothing whatever was known—then, mainly owing to the intervention of Clanricarde, who resented this introduction of a stranger, with possible infants to follow—as a wrong done to poor George's expectations, there had been but little intercourse between the former friends and chums.

There was one slight link between the houses, but it was a very slight one. It was simply this: A Kingshouse woman, one Mary Crosby, who had been Charlie Osborne's nurse, and who had lived with the vicar's family till Mr. Osborne died, was now Mrs. Latimer's servant. She had first nursed Mr. Latimer on his death bed, and had continued in her place as his widow's attendant. After the old gentleman's death her own mother, also a widow, had removed to London from Kingshouse to be near her daughter. And with this ended the Crosby relations with their old home. No one ever heard of them again, save that Mrs. Crosby was dead, and that Mary still went on taking care of the old lady.

Meanwhile, about ten or eleven years ago—just after Mrs. Crosby died—the old lady left London, and took a house on the outskirts of the village of Thorbergh—that village where Thrift was one of the gentlemen's houses which enabled the scanty trade to live. One of Anthony Harford's tenants, she was also one of his most satisfactory—paying her rent with praiseworthy punctuality, never asking for a set-off on account of repairs, never asking for something to be done to the drains, for new kitchen range, nor for another kind of cistern—seeming to desire nothing so much as peace and the absence of all causes for contention.

She kept only this one servant, Mary, and she wanted none other, she said.

"I'm always glad, Mary, when quarter day has come and gone," said the old lady one day to her servant, after the usual formalities had been gone through—when Mr. Trotter had come to duly examine and report on the continued existence of Mrs. Mary Latimer, relict of Andrew Latimer, gentleman, late of Harley street, London, and now of No. 3 Highstile Lane, Thorbergh, and had found her of sound mind and body, and fit and proper recipient of that trimestral two hundred pounds.

"Hoot!" said Mary. "There's no occasion. Everything is just as it should be, and nobody's a penny the wiser."

BRUTE HUMANITY.

Once in the city of Vienna there was a dread of hydrophobia, and orders were given to massacre all the dogs which were found unclaimed or uncollared in the city or suburbs. Men were employed for this purpose, and they generally carried a short stick, which they flung at the poor proscribed animal with such certain aim as either to kill, or maim it mortally at one blow.

It happened one day that, close to the edge of the river, near the Ferdinand's Brucke, one of these men flung his stick at a wretched dog, but with such bad aim that it fell into the river. The poor animal, following his instinct, or his teaching, immediately plunged in, redeemed the stick, and laid it at the feet of its owner, who, snatching it up, dashed out the creature's brains.

Which was the brute?

There are men in whom is no spark of gratitude or generosity. There are others who appreciate benefits received and are happy in making grateful acknowledgment.

Rev. J. W. Askeman, one of the most eloquent divines of Detroit, Mich., writes March 3rd, 1889: "In 1884 I visited Chatham, Ont., to lecture and preach. I was in agonizing pain the result of kidney disorder, and unable to dine with my host. I explained to Judge Woods what was the matter. He asked me if I was too prejudiced by my medical education to try Warner's Safe Cure, adding: 'Although I have never tried it, I can take you to a gentleman whom it has helped wonderfully.'

"I used 2... bottles of Warner's Safe Cure and was in better health than for twenty-five years. I have everything to lose and nothing to gain by making this statement, save the approval of a good conscience."

There are tens of thousands of people in this country who have gained the approval of a good conscience in a like manner, and are not too bigoted to do good.

IN LOVE WITH HIS WIFE.

The Man Who is So Imagines Himself to be Lucky.

There is no mistaking the man, says the Cleveland Leader, who is in love with his wife. He imagines himself the luckiest man on earth, and his little wife is just enough a genius to keep that belief strengthened. Love is the essence of life, and there is no love like that which endures through all the trials and tribulations of wedded life and is still strong and faithful as each life nears its close. Nowadays a man expects his wife to be something more than a good housekeeper or a faithful attendant upon his missing shirt buttons. He wants to find in her a companion—one with whom he can talk and exchange ideas, who sympathizes with him, and who strives to be deemed worthy of his every confidence. Such a wife seldom fails in keeping her husband's affection and respect. She is alive to all his virtues and faults, but she does not ignore the former entirely and regale him only with a long list of his faults.

If there is one thing more than another ... happiness and peace of mind it is the never varying ... of a ... wife. Be very appreciative ... and a little blind to his failings, that is the best ... Credit a man with more virtues than he possesses ... to be just as good as ... [illegible] ... the woman ... severely in her attire and respect is the corner stone of true love. No one ... to be viewed in the light of a neglected wife but in many cases the wife is more or less to blame for being so neglected.

No Faces at the Windows.

New Yorkers never sit in their windows to enjoy the entertainment furnished by the procession of people and vehicles, writes a New York correspondent of the St. Louis Republic. I don't believe I have seen a genuinely fashionable New York man or woman looking out of a window of their own houses in years. It is an unspoken and unwritten law that you shall keep out of sight, and shroud the interior of your houses with layer on layer of lace curtains oftentimes with as many as four different sets of them at each window. The only time a man is privileged to watch the promenaders is at his club, and there many of them do it with a vengeance. A woman never looks into the street from her house. You may walk down Fifth avenue at any time of day, and under no circumstances, unless a military parade was in progress, would you see any woman of that house other than the servants. I presume I have passed by the houses of the Vanderbilts, the Astors, the Goelets and Goulds hundreds of times during recent years, and not a sign of life have I seen beside that contributed by the menials. The custom is doubtless founded upon common sense, because by sitting in windows people become conspicuous, and the alleged intention of "good form" is to remain screened from the vulgar scrutiny of the public. But it is well enough to set down this particular feature of our advanced condition of civilization, because, if I am not mistaken, the enjoyable habit of sitting in windows is practised in most other cities. Of course, we lose a vast amount of entertainment by foregoing the habit, for a study of human nature as you find it on the street is educating and charming. But here we are, for the sake of that severe grandame Good Form, veiling the sun and our fellow-creatures from our fashionable gazes by these very stunning sets of expensive curtains. It is like a theatre with the drop always obscuring the pictures behind it.

President Harrison does not kiss babies not belonging to his own family. When at his public receptions a chubby child is held up to him by a proud mother he simply pats the youngster's head, smiles and if he likes the looks of the babe, may even say, "Ah, goo!" This is very different from Mr. Cleveland's practice. He always kissed the baby.

A New York man was so disagreeably persistent in pressing his suit with a widow that she was compelled to have him arrested and he was fined $10. He paid the fine and went directly to her house to renew his plea. She had him again arrested, and when asked if he would promise to stay away from her he said that he could not, as he loved her too much. So he went to the island for 30 days. Two to one he will marry her when he gets out.

THE LADIES' COLUMN.

Feminine Fashions and Fancies Abloom in the Spring.

A GIRL'S ELECTRICITY.

Cousin Kate's Weekly Budget.

Finishing Touches.

Knife plaited st a muslin in white cream and the dark colors, old blue, rosewood or bright scarlet, is sold by the yard to add as a turned over frill to the neck and sleeves of dress waists, also to form the large jabot or cravat now in vogue down the upper part of the front of the dress.

Crimping instead of fluting, is used by French modistes for the frills on dresses that have accordion plaited skirts.

Shirred ribbon passed around the neck outside the collar of the dress gives a pretty finish to a plain gown, and is a good plan for renewing or concealing a partly worn collar. For this purpose take gros grain ribbon two and a half inches wide the color of the dress or of its trimming then put seven rows of gathers very near together along the middle, leaving a little ruffle at top and bottom. Have this collar lapped to the left side and fastened with a small bow. Ribbon with a satin edge or corded edge is most used. Waistcoats can be made the same way.

An economical and dressy way of using ribbons inside the neck of the dress is to get gros grain ribbon that is only half an inch wide and gathering its lowest edge, sew it just inside the dress collar, having scarcely more than a fourth of an inch showing above the edge; this should be very full to look well, and at each end is left a piece of the ribbon, four or five inches long, to be tied in a small bow just in front.

A Girl's Sad Experience with Electricity.

The Hair Dresser prints the following: "I read," said a bright young married woman, "that there is now a way of removing hair from a woman's lip by the use of electricity. That is not new, and I want to sound a note of warning to any woman who may be tempted to use it. I have a very dear friend who was a classmate of mine in college. She was a real pretty girl but she was greatly annoyed at the fact that a few hairs were growing on her chin and upper lip. They really did not look bad, more like the down of a beautiful peach than anything else, but they were eyesores to her. She tried everything to get rid of them, and finally was persuaded to try electricity. An experienced physician performed the operation, and left her face as smooth as a billiard ball. Six weeks later the hairs returned, greatly increased in size and several shades darker. This time they really did look bad, and the poor girl was almost wild. She has never been able to do anything with them since, and unless she clips them every day—a very tiresome operation—her face looks as though she were really growing a beard. The best way for a woman is to leave her face alone. She only spoils it by tampering."

In Myrtle-Green Velvet.

At a London wedding a few days ago the Princess of Wales wore a costume of dark myrtle green velvet almost black, with a silk bonnet of the same hue relieved with a little white. The three young Princesses were attired in gowns of dull pink silk, with hats [illegible] and short jackets of drab homespun cloth.

Checking Babies at Balls is the latest wrinkle, says the Buffalo, N. Y. [illegible]. At a ball given in that city recently a woman became tired of carrying her little one about in her arms. She took the child to the hat room and put it in a box. The little sleeper was then duly checked, the mother paying 10 cents for the privilege. "I'll keep the baby here till it wakes up, but you must come and get it when it begins to cry," said the man in charge of the hat-room. "All right," replied the mother, and away she went to the ball room, where she enjoyed two hours' recreation. At the end of that time the mother was called out of a set to take care of the baby.

Hardly the Correct Thing.

The list of words, phrases and expressions to be avoided by young ladies of good breeding includes the following:

"I guess so," for I suppose so, or I think so.

"Fix things," for arrange things, or prepare things.

The use of "ride" and "drive" interchangeably.

"Real good" or "real nice" for very good or really nice.

"I have studied some," for studied somewhat, or "I have not studied any" for not studied at all.

"Not as I know," for not that I know.

"Try and experiment," for make an experiment.

"Had rather" for would rather, and "had better," for would better.

"Right away," for immediately or now.

"Well posted," for well informed.

"Try and do," for try to do, or "try and go," for try to go.

"It looks good enough" for it looks well enough, or "does it look good enough," for does it look well enough.

"Somebody else's," for somebody's else.

Refurnishing a Parlor.

Stain your floor a dark walnut, counsels the "Art Amateur," and get a rug of mixed colors of whatever material you can afford. Those of American make imitating Persian rugs are good and will not cost more than, if as much as, a Brussels carpet. Paper the walls with a medium shade of olive green, with small pattern of a darker shade of the same color. This will harmonize with the woodwork. Your walls are too low for a frieze, but you might have a simple border of a lighter color than the field. In your windows have sash curtains of India or Persian silk of a soft shade of yellow and long curtains of Madras muslin with a very light olive-greenish tone.

Your corner shelf may be ebonized as you suggest, with the addition of a curtain of Persian silk running on a narrow brass rod, matching the sash curtains. A Turcoman striped portiere would do very well if judiciously selected. Try and get one with olive ground and stripes of deep blue, red, old gold and white, with perhaps a thread of gold running through. Throw an afghan of harmonizing colors over your unsightly sofa, if you cannot make up your mind to remove it from the room. Cover the rush bottomed arm-chair with the rich dark stuff resembling old tapestry, which comes in quaint designs; this is better than the spun silk you suggested. Cover the small chair with "old gold" plush and ebonize the frame. Do not think of such a thing as painting your "ginger jar." Leave it as it is. Put a few peacock feathers in it and stand it on your corner shelf.

A Climax at a Wedding.

The climax of a Hebrew wedding is the breaking of a wineglass, which the bridegroom crushes under his feet.

Mme. Bonanza's $50,000 Gown.

The monde which last year swore that Mrs. Mackay was papering the smoking-room of her "hotel" with bank notes will no doubt find the bit of gossip very probable that she is awaiting the arrival from Paris of a gown which is embroidered all over with real pearls, and for which she has agreed to pay $50,000.

A Hint for Earnest Women.

Women who want to do real, earnest work in the world should regard a pleasant exterior as part of their equipment. They should put themselves in the hands of a clever milliner who will dress them well without their having to devote either time or attention to a subject so frivolous in itself but so important in its results. M. Renan says, in his "Souvenirs de Jeunesse," as I see quoted in my Figaro, "that talent, genius and virtue are nothing compared with beauty." The French idea again, you see, and by no means an exalted one, but it has its grain of truth.

The Latest Table Decoration.

Charlie has just been telling me about a new and very pretty table decoration that he saw at a dinner at the Hotel Victoria, in Northumberland avenue, New York, last Thursday. It was a long oval table, with a large tank sunk in the centre, nearly filled with water, in which goldfish swam and lilies floated. In this miniature lake were three tiny islands of flowers, from each of which rose a fountain, the whole illuminated by electric light. All round the edge was a border of moss and flowers, the blossoms being chiefly white. A similar, but smaller, lake was arranged at either end of the table, but in these there were no fish, only arum lilies and bulrushes springing from the water. It must have been pretty, I think.

Ladies, it would seem, no longer dye their hair. O, dear no! They never think of doing anything so crude as that. What they do now, if you please, when they wish to give to their locks that bright golden or bronzy tint which is so fashionable, is to "oxidize it."

Mrs. Munemitsu Mutsu, the wife of the Japanese Minister to Washington, is one of the most richly and expensively dressed ladies in Washington. Many of her dresses are made by Worth, but she is so diminutive that it is jokingly said that she pays only half price for her gowns.

Lady Harberton, the English champion of the "divided skirt," is described as plain, almost masculine in form and feature, while her simple and natural dignity of manner bespeaks the lady genuine and refined throughout. For a second marriage 'tis no longer regarded as a crime or heresy to don snow white bridal garments, says a fashion writer in the New York World. Velvet was the widow's first move that has slowly become white silk. Orange blossoms are attempted by only the audacious, while the veil is an unsettled problem. Although the process may be slow it is quite sure, and in the course of time one may celebrate a second ceremony with as much pomp and circumstance as the first.

FULLY ANSWERED.

"Subscriber's" Query Causes Comment.

As our readers will remember, a letter was published in a our columns a few days ago signed "Subscriber," which dwelt at some length upon a subject of general interest and which contained several inquiries which will be found answered in the following:

To the Editor:—Several days ago I noticed a communication in your paper from "Subscriber," in which considerable comment was indulged in concerning the pamphlets which are widely distributed by Messrs. H. H. Warner & Co., of Rochester, N. Y. These pamphlets are published in order that the public may become conversant with the symptoms and growth of disease peculiar to the kidneys, and which is, it must be admitted, the productive cause in a majority of instances of other dreaded disorders. The publishers of these pamphlets are also the discoverers and manufacturers of the noted Warner's Safe Cure, which is known to be the only means for the prevention and cure of kidney disease, as can be testified to in every community. In the pamphlets referred to there appear a number of testimonials from parties who stead [illegible] have been restored to health by Warner's Safe Cure after having been given up by doctors to die, and attached to these statements are the fac-simile signatures of the parties themselves.

I am personally aware that all the testimonials published by this firm are genuine and are the voluntary statements of persons who are anxious to manifest their gratitude for the unexpected return of health and vigor which Warner's Safe Cure has brought them. To make assurance doubly sure it can be added that Messrs. H. H. Warner & Co. have for years published a standing offer of $1,000 to any one who will prove to an impartial referee that any testimonial published by them is not so far as they know [illegible] absolutely true. What more does "Subscriber" desire to convince him [illegible] his own statement, that his neighbors all tell him that Warner's Safe Cure has done more good for them than they have received from the doctors.

In view, Mr. Editor, of the many persons who are sacrificed daily to the bigotry and ignorance of physicians who persist in treating patients for symptoms called consumption, apoplexy, brain troubles and nervous disorders, when the real cause is disease of the kidneys—which should be detected and quickly eradicated by the use of Warner's Safe Cure—I maintain that the value of these pamphlets which place in the hands of the public the means of knowing the truth cannot be overestimated.

Experiments for the cure of consumption has attracted much attention of late years, either for generating ozone for inhalation or for its influence on the vaso-motors as a current, or as static electricity in baths. Dr. Libermann, of Strasburg, employs the continuous current, his view being that pulmonary phthisis is due to a lesion of the pneumogastric nerves, caused by a cold in predisposed subjects. According to Dr. Libermann, the first stage of the disease, that of congestion of the pneumogastrics, is always accompanied by paralysis of one or both vocal cords. In the second period miliary granulations appear in the larynx, lungs and elsewhere. With the third stage, that of proliferation of the connective tissue of the affected nerves, come dyspnœa and hæmoptysis. The last stage of phthisis corresponds to the destruction of the myeline from fatty degeneration. Dr. Libermann denies the specificity of the bacillus, which he says may be found in simple bronchitis and catarrh pneumonia.

FIGHTING WOMEN.

Heroines Who Went to the Wars with Their Liege Lords.

In wartime times, when battle was the business of life and victory over a foe the highest honor that could be had, when home in the true sense there was none and when castles were less houses for pleasant living than strongholds to shelter raiders and resist assault, women were as heroic as their age. If they were not so accurate in their aim as the archers, of whom it is said every English bowman bore under his girdle twenty-four Scots, they knew how to man the ramparts and defend the bridges as well as their lords themselves. Womanliness in the bower, dignity in the hall, courage in the castle—that was the whole duty of these noble women of a rude but manly age, and to their example, their influence and their shaping power as mothers England owes much of her greatness and half of her strength. One of the difficulties which have stood in the way of the substitution of paper pulp for wood in the manufacture of pencils has been the toughness of the paper covering, and its consequent resistance to the action of a knife. By a new process which has recently been patented the molecular cohesion of the paper is modified in such a manner that it can be cut as easily as cedar wood. The paper is first of all made into tubes, and a quantity of them are placed in a frame at the lower end of a cylinder. The substance which is to be used as a marking material is placed in the cylinder while in a plastic condition, and sufficient pressure is then applied to force it into the hollow centres of the paper tubes. After the completion of the process the pencils are gradually dried at increasing temperatures during a period of six days and they are then plunged into a vessel of molten paraffin wax, which has the effect of modifying the texture of the paper pulp in the manner described.

About ten days ago a young man called on several of our citizens wanting to repair their wringers. If the wringer needed repairing he took it away promising to return it as soon as finished. In that way he securred a large number of the instruments, how many we cannot say. Both the young man and the wringers have been missing ever since, and it is supposed he has taken them to Toronto or some other place and sold them.—[Orangeville Advartiser.

On Fridaylast the house of Mr. John Staples, on the 2nd con. Glenelg about two miles from Durham was discovered to be on fire in the roof. Part of the contents were removed but the house and considerable bedding, etc. was destroyed. The fire probably started from the stove-pipe or chimney. The house was a log one, and not worth more than $200 but the inconvience and contents are a more serious loss to Mr. Staples. The house was insured for $100 and there was also $50 on the contents. The neighbors kindly provided Mr. Staples and family with shelter in the mean time. Mr Staples will rebuild as soon as the spring opens. [Review.

Some two years ago an unfortunate young man died in Wiarton of Smallpox and his death caused a scare among the inhabitants so much so that a great difficulty arose in obtaining a place of burial for him. He was ultimately, by the order of certain members of the board of health, buried in a vacant lot within a distance of sixty feet of a house owned by Mrs. Smith. In consequence of the proximity of the grave, Mrs. Smith's Tenant left the house, and she was unable to get any person to take the tenant's place. Mrs. Smith thereupon brought an action against the village of Wiarton, claiming that the board of Health was the servant of the Corporation and that the Corporation was therefore liable for its acts. The case was tried at Walkerton Fall Assizes and was argued in Toronto last Saturday by John Creasor, Q.C., for Mrs. Smith, and Mr. H. P. O'Connor for the village of Wiraton before Mr. Justice Falconbridge, who gave judgement in favor of the village dismissing the action with costs.—Walkerton Telescope.

Away From the Throng

It may not be—yet it seems to me
Away from the throng is best;
By some lonely shore where the waters roar,
Or far in the crimson west.
For friends are few that are sure and true—
Aye, the crowd is a mob to me;
More tame and mild is the distant wild,
More calm is the stormiest sea.

Ah, it must be so, for the wisest know
That man is a foe to man!
The love is small that extends to all,
Tho' we trust it as we can
To have one friend at a long life's end,
Is a blessing rare, I sigh,
One faithful clasp as we dying gasp—
One glance in an honest eye!

Yet there's love in all, in great and small,
In the fiend whom all avoid;
You may see its gleam in a demon's dream,
And it cannot be destroyed.
In the great and least, in man and beast,
'Tis the soul, till life shall fail;
I'm sure 'tis part of my lady's heart,
And it wags my spaniel's tail.

Is it I sigh again as I say with pain,
Away from the throng is best,
My fondest dreams are of woods and streams
Afar in the hostile west
There's a gleam I prize in my horse's eyes,
And I like—three dogs at most—
Aye, one dear face is my heart has place,
But it cannot hold a host

ESTELLE'S INFATUATION:

A NOVEL.

"It's a queer feeling," said Mrs. Latimer, "I sometimes misdoubt myself."

"Misdoubt yourself of what?" queried Mary, sharply. "That you are Mrs. Latimer?"

"My word, lass, but you are a stanch 'un!" said the old lady, with a little laugh.

"There is not much good in being slack," returned the young woman. "What we've undertaken to do that we have to stick to, and we have Scripture warrant for not looking back when we've put our hand to the plough."

"Yes," said Mrs. Latimer, a little dryly. "But maybe our plough is one the Scriptures wouldn't much hold with."

"And why not?" asked Mary. "Not to do the good you do? What would become of that blessed Master Charlie but for the help he gets from his friend unbeknown—Mrs. Latimer, of Thorbergh? And, I ask, why shouldn't we as had to bear the heat and burden of the day have our reward when we have worked so hard for it?"

"Ay, we have worked hard," said Mrs. Latimer. "And it was a shame that the master never so much as left a five-pound note after you had done all that you did for him."

"I have taken my change out of him for it," said Mary, with quiet grimness. "Folk should think twice b'fore they do unjustly and make enemies in this world. One never knows when one's sin may not find one out, and the one as we've trampled on rise up in judgment against us."

"No," said Mrs. Latimer, but she spoke with a cough, and a little uneasily; and Mary saying, "You'll be wanting your tea, Mrs. Latimer," bustled out of the room, bringing the conversation to a close.

"It'll all come to light some day," said the old lady, resuming her eternal knitting. "It was a rash thing to do; but the temptation was great, and Mary, she's that strong headed there's no going counter to her. But she's overbold and confident, is Mary, and doesn't seem to think or fear. I'd like to know the end of it for my part, and what the sentence would be. I fancy it would be pretty heavy. But Mary says there's no chance, and I don't see any great fear myself. Still it's sure to come out, if not one day then another, and I'd go out of it afore if I had the chance. But I don't very well see how that can be. I'm glad we have that tidy lot saved and put away there in the bedtick. No banks for me, not if I know it, with their managers and directors and trash who go off with the brass and leave the dupes to starve. A good bit of stout cloth, well sewed with waxed thread and hid among the feathers—that's my style, and it's the best, I reckon, out of the lot! And while it's there we can just make ourselves scarce if things look like Queer street, and our room would be better than our company. But it's a venturesome thing to do, and I oft wonder at myself. And really, if it were not for Master Charles, I think I'd be fit to give up any day of the year. But that bonny bairn holds me to it little as he knows what's being done for him, or who's a doing it. Lord love him! The last time I saw him and he gave me that kiss, he took the heart out of me; and I said to myself then, "Ye bonny little lad, if ever I can do you a good turn I will," and I've stuck to my word even onto this, and I will to the end, that I will!" Here Mary brought in the tea, and Mrs. Latimer's musings came to an end.

This, then, was the annuitant whom Anthony Harford had promised Mrs. Clanricade he would see to report on her condition, which the impecunious wife of that unlucky George—the ill starred mother of that perverse Estelle—hoped would be as full of evil circumstances as were compatible with life and prophetic of speedy death. But he would not go to see her yet, being still under the spell at Kingshouse waiting to see how things would turn whether he should have to live down that fever, or finally be enabled to slake it at the sometimes too satisfying, too refrigerating fount of matrimony—that sometimes grave of love, into which, however, love must needs descend. If Mrs. Latimer and Mary had known that at this present moment their landlord was at Kingshouse, dining with the residuary legatee, George Clanricarde watching, studying Estelle, whom Charlie Osborne loved and loved Charlie—while giving his soul as a habitation for seven devils to possess because he saw just the nameless and formless shadow of that love cast athwart his own path—if they had known of all those links being now forged between them and their past—them and their future—even stout-hearted Mary would have quailed, and the vivacious black eyes of the old lady would have paled with fear. But nothing being known, nothing was foreseen. Anthony remained at Kingshouse; Mrs. Latimer drew her quarterly allowance; Charlie Osborne studied the stars from the streets of Yokohama; Estelle wrote to him long letters of constant love and gentle trust; and Mrs. Clanricarde, taught by experience, walked warily and made no mistake.

CHAPTER XII.

THE GRAND COUP.

"At Yokohama, of fever, Charles, the only son of Rev. James Osborne, late Vicar of Kingshouse." This was the announcement in the Times which Mrs. Clanricarde read first—Mr. Clanricarde having taken the whole inside, telegrams, leading articles, and the money market, leaving to his wife the advertisements and the "dead and alive." This was almost the only privilege of his sex which that unlucky George dared to claim. For all the rest his wife came first, and her will ruled where his yielded.

Mrs. Clanricarde read the announcement without the quivering of a muscle or the turning of a hair. She read it, indeed, as if she had expected it, and looked over the top of the page at her daughter, speculating on her reception of the thunder-bolt which neither surprised nor shocked herself. Estelle was eating her luncheon ignorant of and not foreseeing the blow that was about to fall. No presentiment warned her now, nor had any foreshadowed her coming sorrow. The Psychical Society would have nothing of her. She had had no dream of Charlie—pale, tearful, looking at her with eyes full of a mournful farewell—no vision had passed before her, halting for a moment to fill her heart with the pain and terror of love—no voice calling her name in the dear accents so well known had sounded in her ear—no dog had howled in warning—no owl had hooted ghastly presage. Full of sorrow and pity for this illness which had struck down her beloved, she had also the buoyant belief of youth, and felt sure that he would recover. For to love, life is immortality, and the beloved cannot died.

At this moment she was not thinking of anything very definitely. She was only dumbly conscious, as always now, of Anthony Harford, and her ever-increasing difficulties himward. She knew that the net was drawing daily tighter and closer around her, and that the repelling power she had over him almost like a mesmeric power—would one day be broken through, to her dread and danger. She was conscious that she would have at last to hear what she had so long restrained. Yet she meant to make a good fight of it, and to appeal to his generosity as she had already appealed to Caleb Stagg's. But she was more than doubtful of the result. The masterful will and hard-mouthed resoluteness of Anthony made a man of a very different mould from Caleb Stagg in his lowly humility and tender self-abnegation. Anthony would marry the woman he fancied, however reluctant she might be, supremely confident that he could distance every rival, and wipe out every other thought or affection when once he had her as his own and could woo her as he would. He was a man who owned no superior, and whose master had yet to be born. What he set his hand to do, that would he eventually accomplish—the most formidable obstacles counting no more than so many straws in his way. And a woman's love ranked with the rest. Whatever moments of depression and doubt he might have, the central thread remained unbroken—the woman he loved he would have, and the woman he had should love him.

All this Estelle felt rather than formulated. Still, she meant to make a good fight of it. And perhaps she would after all succeed. How could a man marry a girl whose love was another's, and who said frankly she could never love him, and would always hate him, if even he took her by force? He could not! To Estelle the very idea was sacrilege; and Anthony Harford, though self-willed, was not sacrilegious. Yet even if he were, and even if he should insist on this crime, there was always one door left open—she could run away. She had money, got in a mysterious manner, and really Charlie's, not hers. That did not much matter. The tie between them was so intimate, their lives were so thoroughly fused together, that no shame attached to her using his money for her own preservation from an unholy marriage. Bank-notes, crisp and clean, sent, he never knew nor could discover by whom, came two or three times a year to him. They were addressed to the Post-Office, Kingshouse, and their receipt was given in the Times, under the initials "C. O." When Charlie went to London the letters were forwarded to him in due course from the office. When he went abroad, he empowered Estelle to receive them, and to keep the money as a future provision for themselves. She had done so; and she had sent the acknowledgments to the paper, as she had been instructed. And now she had close on a hundred pounds, which would help her to the maintenance of her integrity if pushed to the last resource. It would be a desperate step to take; and she trembled when she thought of it, as she often did, realizing the shame and scandal and disgrace of her plight, and the blow it would be to her mother. But if needs must, she would. She would do anything rather than marry Anthony Harford, with Charlie at Yokohama, looking across the seas, trusting in her constancy, and waiting for renewed health to embark and claim her. She would feel herself guilty of a shameful crime were she to marry another while her true love and promised husband lived. Not all the vows said before the altar, not all the blessings pronounced by the priest, nor the iron links forged by the law and recognized by society, could make her feel other than an adulteress were she to yield herself to insistence—whether her mother's or Anthony Harford's. She was Charlie's, none other's; and during his life no other man should own her.

If she was thinking at all, she was thinking all this, but she was feeling rather than thinking, and quietly eating her somewhat slender luncheon—as we all must eat, poor slaves of matter as we are, let what will betide!

Still holding the paper in her hand, Mrs. Clanricarde called Estelle to come with her into the drawing-room. She had put on a mask of sorrow, and the girl saw that something was amiss. Her mind swept rapidly round the narrow circle of distant friends, but the very immensity of her fear excluded the worst for Charlie. Love deals so gently with suspicion in all its forms! When a friend hints at a fault, you do not suppose a crime; when a child falls ill, the mother does not foresee death. Were it otherwise, love would be a burden too great to be borne, and the heart would be crushed beneath its weight.

"My dear, I have bad news for you," began Mrs. Clanricarde, with great tenderness and sympathy of voice and manner.

"What is it, mother?" asked Estelle, her soft eyes opened wide and dark as the sunless night.

"You must be brave, my dear," she returned. "It will be a heavy blow to you. Poor Charlie!"

"What is it, mother?" asked Estelle again, with preternatural calmness. She seemed as if struck to stone, pale and rigid as a statue.

"Ah, poor boy! I can realize his goodness now! I am so grieved for him, and for you, my dear," said Mrs. Clanricarde, softly. She pressed her handkerchief to her eyes.

"Mother, what is it," repeated Estelle, with the strange sternness of great and sudden fear.

She laid her hand on her mother's arm, and unconsciously gripped it till she nearly caused her to shriek for pain.

"He is gone, dear!" said Mrs. Clanricarde—"gone to heaven, where he will never suffer more?"

"It is not true!" said Estelle, "He could not have died without coming to us. He would not!"

Her mother gave her the paper.

"Here is the announcement," she said. "I know no more than you."

Estelle looked at it. Her large eyes were opened wide, her lips were parched, her brain was all confused and as if on fire. The letters seemed to form themselves into individual and living creatures, which had each its own physiognomy; and then they were like the clanging of bells sounding in her ears—"At Yokohama, of fever, Charles, the only son of the Rev. James Osborne, late Vicar of Kingshouse." It was a kind of dirge sound, flowing out from that point where the letters turned to living creatures on the paper, showing to eyes what the bells sounded to her ears. There was not a tear, not a sob, not a sigh—only this dry, wild-eyed statuesque horror of attention, like one looking into the grave of the beloved.

Her mother spoke to her; she did not hear. She put her arm round the stiffened shoulders; she did not feel.

"Estelle! Estelle!" she said; "speak to me, dear. Estelle, ma cherie, speak!"

The girl looked at mother at first as if she did not know her; then she shuddered and pushed that mother from her with a movement of irrepressible horror.

"Let me go!" she said, hoarsely. "I must be alone. Let me go, mother. I cannot bear it!"

"Kiss me before you go," said Mrs. Clanricarde, who was really frightened.

"Kiss you!" said Estelle. "No; you are his murderess! I will never kiss you again!"

For the moment she was in truth and in deed absolutely mad.

"Good God! have I gone too far?" thought Mrs. Clanricarde. "Is her brain really turned

With a strange gesture, and a face that had only her features, but none of her natural expression, the girl turned from the room and went upstairs to her own, where she double-locked the door and shut herself in with her sorrow and despair. All that day she remained invisible; would not open the door nor come down stairs; would not eat; would scarcely answer when they knocked—sitting there in a kind of trance wherein her soul went down into the grave. Her mother's prayers went for nothing; she returned only short monosyllables in reply—monosyllables which would have been fierce had they not been so dry and dead. To her father her tone was somewhat softer. He was free from blood guiltiness, and had not helped in the murder of her beloved. At last Mrs. Clanricarde, whose compassion was at all times but a rather shallow stream, tired of this dumb strife and mute rebellion, and peremptorily commanded her to open the door and see her and speak to her. And Estelle, overcome by the force of habit, did as she was told, and let her mother enter.

Mrs. Clanricarde gave a little cry when she saw her daughter. From 2 o'clock until now, 10, she had changed almost as if she had been transformed. All the tender, supple, timid grace had gone out of her face and figure. There was no shyness in her eyes, no love upon her lips, no line of yielding, of sympathy, of girlish love, of womanly softness left in her. She looked like a modern Medusa, turning to stone for her own part, and capable of turning to stone all those who looked on her. No tears were in her eyes, and none had been. Her parted lips were as dry and as pathetic as the Cenci's, but they were less loving.

"My dear child! my Estelle!" cried Mrs. Clanricarde, sincerely shocked and stirred.

"What do you want with me, mother?" asked Estelle, coldly.

"Why have you kept away from me?" returned the mother. "Am I not always here to receive your sorrow and feel with you in your grief?"

"Hush!" said Estelle, lifting her hand. "Not a word of that. Your sympathy!" she added, with deadly scorn. It had in it the essence of a curse.

"I forgive you, Estelle," she said, trying to speak quietly. "Your mind is upset, and you are not yourself. You do not know what you say, my poor child, and it is the mother's part to have mercy and to forgive."

Estelle stood unmoved. All filial feeling seemed to have died in her—to be submerged in the fiery deluge of her grief for her beloved. Mrs. Clanricarde took her hand, but her daughter shook off her mother's, as if it had been some noxious thing that pained her.

"Don't touch me, mother," she said, harshly. "Leave me to myself. Why have you come to torment me?"

"Now, Estelle, this nonsense must cease," said Mrs. Clanricarde, suddenly severe in her turn. "If poor Charlie Osborne has died of fever, is that my fault? Why should you turn against me and behave yourself like a maniac as you are doing. It is absurd, and undutiful as well, and I will not allow it. So I tell you."

A strange and ominous glare came into those beautiful brown eyes, usually so soft and tender.

"Mother, if you do not leave me at once I shall go mad," she cried, in a hoarse voice that had not a trace of her natural silver, her rightful melody, upon its roughened notes. "Leave me to myself—that is the only way in which I can live. You send me mad to see and hear you."

"And you are a wicked and undutiful girl; but I forgive you, and I am always your mother, ready to receive and comfort you," said Mrs. Clanricarde, part revolted, part frightened by this outburst, as she turned and left the room, halting at the door to say, "At least promise me one thing, Estelle—do not lock the door."

"If you promise not to open it," said Estelle, in the same rough and unnatural tones, making a step forward. On which her mother left her, and the girl went back into the fiery hell of her despair.

"I wish I had never seen you!" cried Mrs. Clanricarde, with true French peevishness, to unlucky George. "Everything connected with you turns ill. Here is now mademoiselle, your daughter, a stark staring lunatic, because that absurd young man has died at Yokohama. From such a father what else can be expected?"

That unlucky George smiled fatuously. Then his eyes filled up with tears. He loved Estelle with more intrinsic tenderness, more simplicity of affection, than did her mother, and he felt for her in her present trial with a faithfulness of sympathy which that mother could not compass nor even understand.

"Poor Estelle!" he said. "It is a hard trial for her."

"God sends us all trials," said Mrs. Clanricarde, with the tart religiosity of the cross-tempered. "Estelle has to submit, as we all must. I have to endure you," she added, a little below her breath.

But her husband did not hear. He was great at not hearing, as at times he was great at not seeing. And then sleep came down over the household, and only the miserable Estelle stood by the window, looking up to the starry sky, wondering in which bright point her darling's soul was placed, sure that he was looking down on her and pitying her despair.

"He, at least, is happy," she said to herself again and again for reassurance. "I am selfish to be so wretched! I should be happy, knowing that he is out of pain and sorrow. But oh! he would have been so very, very happy had he lived, with my love, as I with his. Oh, that we might have known that love—that dear sweet life together, before God had taken him to Himself!"

It was the cry of a human heart making itself heard in spite of all the comforting assurances of faith—the pitiful sob of love, stronger than death, and dearer than the eternal heaven of an unfading joy.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE LAYING OF THE GROUND.

Days passed, and Estelle was still invisible to the world outside Les Saules, and but rarely to that within. She was ill, her mother said to Anthony Harford and all other inquirers; which, indeed, was but too true, and ill as much mentally as physically.

She would see no one—not even Lady Elizabeth—and certainly not Anthony Harford. For him, indeed, she showed such shuddering repugnance that her mother was afraid to press her. The sacrifice of herself had to be made, cost her what it would. She had to be Anthony's wife, though she paid the supreme forfeit in return.

On this point Mrs. Clanricarde was inexorable. She was emphatically a modern mother with whom love counts as folly, and money is the only desirable good in marriage—who will welcome as her son-in-law a moral leper or a physical, if sufficiently well gilded—to whom a daughter's heart is merely a muscular arrangement, to be pressed down when inconveniently active, and to be ignored when only passively suffering.

During this time of the girl's first anguish of despair Anthony Harford's state was only a shade less pitiable than hers. He controlled all outward expression of feeling as rigidly as if he had been a true red-skin, and only Lady Elizabeth knew what no one else saw nor suspected. Lady Elizabeth put matters on a more truthful basis, for indeed she could not be aught but truthful, let the cost be what it might.

"Yes, she was what is meant by 'in love' with him," she said, with her gentle straightforwardness when Anthony asked her if there had been anything like a love affair—an engagement—between Miss Clanricarde and this young man, whose name at this moment filled the air—"and they were in a manner engaged—in that hopeless way where there is no money now and very little chance of any hereafterward—where the engagement is only between themselves—not known to the world nor sanctioned by her parents."

"But he is dead now," said Anthony.

"Poor dear Charlie! yes, too surely!" said Lady Elizabeth.

"And was he such a wonderful person, really now?" asked Anthony, with no unnecessary suavity—with scarcely as much as was indeed quite necessary.

"Yes," said Lady Elizabeth; "he was a dear fellow. We all liked him."

"You, too, Lady Elizabeth?"

"I, too," she said.

"But he is dead now," repeated Anthony, a little more harshly than even before. "And no woman loves the dead forever to the exclusion of the living," he added.

Lady Elizabeth did not answer. In her own mind she thought it probable that Estelle would go on loving Charlie dead as she loved him living. Once to love would be always to love with herself; and she credited her broken-hearted friend with her constancy.

"She shall forget him," continued Anthony, in a certain sense piqued by her non-response. "I will love her so that she shall not remember him, still less lament him. She shall find her happiness in my arms," he went on, more as if speaking to himself than to a listener. "She shall be so happy in my love, so well cared for, that she will not even wish to change could her wish bring back the dead."

Lady Elizabeth's face became as pale as the snow-drops in the vase beside her.

"If she married you, I know that you would be good to her," she said, in a low, level voice, without inflection or emphasis.

"If? She shall!" returned Anthony, speaking with the intensity of constrained passion. "Neither man or devil shall keep her from me! She is destined."

"Hush!" said Lady Elizabeth, blanched to her very lips. "You make me shudder."

"Why?" he asked, with all his usual gentleness, all the chivalrous tenderness which was his ordinary bearing when he spoke to her. "Why should you shudder?"

"It seems almost as if you were forcing fate—compelling your own destiny, which is always sorrow," she said.

He took both her hands. It was his favorite action with her.

"Oh, you Delight!" he said, with a smile. "Are you too, daughter of the gods as you are, superstitious like the little people whose brains are no bigger than pigmies?"

"Who can help it who cares for another's happiness?" was her ingenuous reply, made steadily and without shamefacedness.

"And you care for mine?"

"Yes, indeed," she answered. She still spoke with steadiness, direct and unashamed.

"How I wish you were my sister!" said Anthony. "Estelle my wife—you my sister—I would ask nothing more from Heaven but long life to enjoy my superb happiness!"

Something, she did not know what it was, nor could she control it, seemed to come up into Lady Elizabeth's eyes and throat. She felt choking, as if deep waters were closing over her head—as if she must cry out for help. Help for what? She could not answer. Her voice had gone; she had no power of speech left in her; but Anthony, irritable and sore on his own side.

After some further talk Mr. Harford left the Dower House, no nearer to his great desire than when he had gone there, but with a heart somewhat lightened in that vague manner of a clearer moral atmosphere, where, though things are not more definite, the clouds seem to have lifted.

During all these days of Estelle's seclusion, Anthony Harford was like a soul in pain.

At last time worked its partial cure so far that Estelle consented to re-appear in the world. Such love as Anthony Harford had already felt flamed hotter and higher when he saw her for the first time after her illness. He would not see in her state the result of grief, only the result of physical ailment; and he felt for her in consequence that very passion of tenderness which strong men feel for the woman they love, when those women are even more helpless than usual, more frail and more dependent.

"I am glad to see you again, and sorry you have been sick," he said, holding her hand in both of his.

"Thank you; I am better," she answered, wearily, not looking at him.

"You have been very sick, I can see that," he continued, with great tenderness.

She made no reply. She only drew away her hand, more coldly than with repugnance. A spasm crossed Anthony's face like a shadow. It was repeated in Mrs. Clanricarde's

"She will spoil everything," she thought to herself. "Was ever mother so cursed as I?"

"You should give her a change of air, Mrs. Clanricarde," said Anthony, turning to the mother.

"It is scarcely the weather for the sea," she said; "and London air is not bracing."

She did not add, "and too costly for my crippled purse," which she might have done had she been careful for the truth.

"The air at Thirlt is notoriously fine," said Anthony, hastily. "I must be back there next week. Why not come with me for a change, all three of you? I am sure it would do Miss Clanricarde good in every way."

He added these last words in the spirit of a woman's postscript—as a rider that included more than the main text.

"That would be delightful!" said Mrs. Clanricarde, eagerly. "I know that change is just what Estelle wants to set her up again."

"Then you will come?" he added. "Will you like that, Miss Clanricarde? Will you like to come to my place?" he added, speaking directly to Estelle.

"No," said Estelle, with a sudden look of fear in her eyes. "Do not go, mother! do not let us leave home!"

"It will do you good, my dear," answered her mother, suavely. "It is for your own sake."

"If for mine, then I do not wish it," persisted the girl.

"It will do you good," said Anthony.

"I do not want any good done to me," she answered, with curious sullenness—curious, that is, in the girl she used to be; common enough, alas! in these later times.

Her opposition wrought the usual effect of all opposition on Anthony. It strengthened his resolve and braced his determination.

"Your mother consents, and I hold her to her promise," he said, with sudden sternness. "If it is disagreeable to you, you make tracks home if you like. But you've got to come and see for yourself."

"Mother!" appealed Estelle.

"Don't be silly, child," said Mrs. Clanricarde, with affected banter and real displeasure. "What is there to object to in paying a visit to a beautiful country house in a superb country place. One would think you were asked to go a prison!"

"You are not very flattering to me either," said Anthony, as sternly as before.

He was not so supple as Mrs. Clanricarde, and he did not think his habitual self-command quite in place at this moment.

"I do not wish to flatter you," said Estelle, drawing herself up, and speaking with intense haughtiness.

Anthony saw the folly and humiliation of a war of words with a girl in such a mood.

"Well, no," he laughed, with a good-humor as forced as Mrs. Clanricarde's banter had been. "That would scarcely be the way. At all events we have got so far on the road; so much is settled. You and your father and mother will come with me to Thrift next week, and you will get back there all your roses, I promise you."

"So far the ground is laid," said Anthony to himself. "All now depends on myself."

R. A. Gunn, M.D., Dean and Professor of Surgery of the United States Medical College, Editor of "Medical Tribune," Author of "Gunn's New and Improved Hand-book of Hygiene and Domestic Medicine," referring to Warner's Safe Cure, said: "I find that in Bright's disease it seems to act as a solvent of albumen: to soothe and heal inflammed membranes, and wash out epithelial debris which blocks up the tubuli uriniferi (urine bearing tubes); and to prevent the destructive metamorpeosis of tissue. * * * I am willing to acknowledge and commend thus frankly the value of Warner's Safe Cure."

"It Could Not Happen Now."

Ere country ways have turned to street
And long ere we were born,
A lad and lass would chance to meet
Some merry April morn;
The willows bowed to nudge the brook,
The cowslips nodded gay,
And he would look, and she would look
And both would look away.
Yet each—and this is so absurd—
Would dream about the other,
And she would never breathe a word
To that good dame, her mother.
Our girls are wiser now.
'Twas very quaint, 'twas very strange,
Extremely strange you must allow.
Dear me! how modes and customs change!
It could not happen now.

Next day that [illegible] last
Would rearrange her hair
And ponder long before the glass
Which bow she ought to wear;
And often she'd neglect her task,
And seldom care to chat,
And make her mother frown, and ask
"Why do you [illegible] like that?"
And now she'd haunt with footsteps slow
That mead with cowslips yellow,
Down which she'd met a week ago
That stupid, staring fellow.
Our girls are wiser now.
'Twas very quaint, 'twas very strange,
Extremely strange, you must allow.
Dear me! how modes and customs change!
It could not happen now.

And as for him, that foolish lad,
He'd hardly close an eye,
And look so woe-begone and sad,
He'd make his mother cry.
"He goes," she'd say, "from bad to worse!
My boy so blithe and brave.
Last night I found him writing verse
About a [illegible] grave."
And lo! next day her nerves he'd shock
With laugh and [illegible] and paper
And there [illegible] a golden lock
Wrapped up in tissue paper.
Our boys are wiser now.
'Twas very quaint, 'twas very strange,
Extremely strange you must allow.
Dear me! how modes and customs change!
It could not happen now.

The Beyond.

It seemeth such a little way to me
Across to that strange country, the Beyond;
And yet not strange, for it has grown to be
The home of those of whom I am so fond.
They make it seem familiar and most dear
As journeying friends bring distant countries near.

So close it lies that when my sight is clear
I think I see the brightly gleaming strand;
I know I feel that those who've gone from here
Come near enough to touch my hand.
I often think, but for our veiled eyes,
We should find Heaven round about us lies.

I cannot make it seem a day to dread
When from this dear earth I shall journey out
To that still dearer country of the dead
And join the lost ones so long dreamed about.
I love this world, yet shall I love to go
And meet the friends who wait for me, I know.

I never stand above a bier and see
The seal of death set on some well loved face
But that I think one more to welcome me
When I shall cross the intervening space
Between this land and that one over there—
One more to make the strange Beyond seem fair.

And so for me there is no sting to death,
And so the grave has lost its victory;
It is but crossing with a bated breath
And white set face a little strip of sea,
To find the loved ones waiting on the shore
More beautiful, more precious than before.

Feeding Apples to Dairy Cows.

A farmer reports his experience in feeding apples to dairy cows as follows: "A small Devon heifer that dropped her first calf in January ran in an ordinary pasture the following summer and was fed windfall apples night and morning, gradually increasing the amount until she had a bushel per day. I measured the milk every day and found a general increase, then I fed less and less two or three days and at the close of the week she had none, when she gave two quarts less, beer measure. I was selling the milk at 5 cents per quart. I repeated the experiment and obtained the same results. In feeding, I have found it safer to cut the apples than to feed them whole, as there is less danger of their getting choked and less danger of getting sore gums, as sometimes happens from eating hard apples whole. There is not much danger in feeding all large or small apples alone, the danger is with medium-sized mixed with large ones."

Tombstone, A.T., is famous for its apt names. Its leading newspaper is called the Epitaph, and the sheriff of the county is Colonel Slaughter. He defeated Major Blood by two votes at a recent election. Captain Cutts was also a candidate, but was nowhere in the race.

SOMETHING YOU SHOULD KNOW.

Many of our readers have often asked "What is Bright's Disease of the Kidneys, about which we hear so much?" To answer their question we have secured the following explanatory article, written by a competent authority:

The symptoms of Bright's Disease (which is but an advanced form of Kidney Disease) differ in different individuals, but generally the patient presents a flabby, bloodless look, is drowsy and easily fatigued, has pain in the back, vomiting and febrile disturbance. The urine is reduced in quantity, is often of dark, smoky or bloody color, and exhibits to chemical reaction presence of a large amount of albumen, while under the microscope blood corpuscles and casts are found.

There are several forms of the malady, but their common prominent characteristic is the presence of albumen in the urine, and frequently also the co-existence of dropsy. These associated symptoms, in connection with Kidney Disease was first described in 1827 by Dr. Richard Bright, an English physician, who first investigated them. Sometimes there is a degeneration of the tissues of the kidney into fat, thus impairing the excreting powers of the organ so that the urea is not sufficiently separated from the blood. The flow of the blood, when charged with this urea, is retarded through the minute vessels, congestion ensues, and exudation of albumen and fibrin is the result. The disease is often accompanied by eruptions on the skin, as boils, etc., and is frequently associated with enlargement of the heart.

The causes of this terrible malady are, indulgence in too much ice water as a beverage, strong drink, high living, indigestion, exposure to wet and cold, various kinds of fevers, malaria, pregnancy, and other bodily derangements, such as a complication of certain acute diseases like erysipelas, diphtheria, and especially scarlet fever (of which it is one of the most frequent and serious after effects), diseases of bones and other scrofulous affections.

Common-sense treatment of Kidney Disease of the character referred to necessarily involves removal of the causes, rectification of other secretions and increase in the number of blood-red corpuscles, by the administration of Warner's Safe Cure. It is a specific even in the advanced stages, when the blood has poisoned the nerve centres, restoring the secretion of healthy fluids and relieving the congestion of the brain. It speedily arrests the inflammatory action, which is marked by an increased amount of urine. The albumen gradually disappears, the dropsy subsides and the patient recovers. There is no standstill in advanced Kidney Disease; those who are affected with it are either constantly growing better or worse. How important, therefore, that this terrible disease be taken in hand in time and treated with a known specific.

WORSHIPPING A WOMAN.

Singular Delusion of the "Congregation of the Lord."

A singular religious delusion is revealed by the evidence taken in the equity proceedings of the "Congregation of the Lord" to recover from the heirs of Anna Meister the property 1,1[illegible] South Eleventh street. Seven members of the congregation purchased the building in 1864 and had the deed recorded in the name of "J. Elimar Mira Mitta," which means "the daughter of Jehovah," whom the congregation worshipped. This person was Anna Meister, a Swiss woman, and the fascination she exercised upon the credulity of her followers was remarkable. They paid $5,000 for the house of worship, but found upon the death of "the daughter of Jehovah" that her heirs would inherit the property unless legal measures were taken.

The case has been before a master for two years. Lawyer William H. Staake looking after the interests of the Meister heirs, and the matter is now in shape to be presented to court. From the evidence submitted it appears that the worship began in 1856. The woman was looked upon as the third person in the Trinity and in her house a temple of worship was set up. The front part of the second story of her home was fitted up with an altar pulpit and all the paraphernalia necessary for an imposing service. Ceremonies were held every Sunday. Myra Mitta, surmounted with a crown studded with brilliants symbolical of her high estate, encircled with a girdle sparkling with gems, in a loose silken robe preached to her abject followers, who bowed before her. A costly cloth covered the chair on which she sat in order to protect her from contact from all that was sinful.

Lissette Munnert, who was in Myra Mitta's household, testified before the master: "I think the Lord formed the congregation. She was brought to us and it was shown from the Lord that we had to take care of her. I believe she was the Third Person of the Holy Trinity."

Miss Munnert also said that she believed Mira Mitta could do more than any other person on earth and that by merely placing her hands on sickly persons she brought them back to health.

Mrs. Caroline Lang, another witness said that an angel appeared at the meeting of the congregation on Ridge avenue in 1876. The angel bore a scroll on which was written in golden letters that Mira Mitta is the daughter of Jehovah and the sister of the Saviour.

The daughter of the great Jehovah was possessed of good, substantial common sense on some points at least, as one incident illustrates. On one occasion as she was about raising a glass of hydrant water to her lips, an unseen power dashed it from her hands and writing appeared upon a table to the effect that henceforth Mira Mitta should not drink hydrant water unless it was first boiled. This astonishing revelation was communicated to the members of the church, and they thereupon unanimously resolved never to drink Schuylkill water again without boiling it.

Never Tired.

When this country was first settled there was an impression among the colonists that the Indians had no intelligence or craft in their relations with the white men. The latter soon found, however, that this was not the case. Some of the farmers attempted to make farm servants of the Indians, but discovered that they had a propensity to "get tired" so soon after they began work that their services were of little value. One day a farmer was visited by a stalwart Indian, who said "Me want work."

"No," said the farmer, "you will get tired."

"No, no," said the Indian, "me never get tired."

The farmer, taking his word for it, set the Indian at work and went away about some other business. Toward noon he returned to the place and found the Indian sound asleep under a tree.

"Look here, look here," shouted the farmer, shaking the Indian violently, "you told me that you never got tired, and yet here you are stretched out on the ground."

"Ugh," said the Indian rubbing his eyes and slowly clambering to his feet, "if me not lie down, me get tired like the rest."

The Latest Evening Fashions.

Dressing for the evening, writes a London society correspondent, is just beginning in earnest; until now the dresses worn at night have been rather quiet. The richest silks are worn and quantities of jewellery, but no flowers. Miss Fortescue looked charming on Saturday night in a cream colored demi-toilette with a high mascotte collar made of transparent cream colored lace, and wearing a very beautiful necklace and crescent brooch of diamonds—not the white diamonds, but those which hold all the colors of the rainbow. Lady Dorothy Nevile made a marvellous toilette of very rich flowered silk covered with enormous roses, and made in the quaintest way, so that she looked just like a lady in an old picture. Now that jewellery is worn to such an extent any one who possesses old-fashioned trinkets can show them to admiration, as it seems impossible to put on too many. Lady Dorothy Nevile wore a magnificent necklace and a [illegible] round her throat, on which hung three quaint and brilliant pendants. Mrs. Labouchere wears very fine white diamonds and makes her dress subordinate to them as many persons do just now. It is a subject of discussion among Mrs. Chamberlain's admirers whether her diamonds or her pearls are the finest, but I believe the pearls really carry off the palm. Some ladies wear both diamond and pearl necklaces at the same time, in order to be in the front of the fashion.

Lady Dufferin's Connemara Cloak.

The papers have been talking about who brought the first Connemara cloak into fashion and it is like the tailless evening coat, credited to every social personage of any importance. The tailless coat, by the bye, is credited to the duke, while the cloak is credited to the bull. The truth about it is that it had its birth in the smart world through Lady Dufferin. Her ladyship had been in Ireland and was there presented with a very fine piece of Irish frieze. She took it to London with her and asked her tailor if he couldn't make her a long wrap out of it, something out of the common and which would be stamped as decidedly individual. With quick wit he suggested just such a cloak as the Irish peasant wears, and so it had its birth. Lady Dufferin had a number made and soon all London was wearing them because they were so useful and could be so easily assumed. However, I do not think her ladyship expected them to be worn as street wraps, nor did she foresee that caught in the March wind they made the slender woman look like a balloon and the stout woman like the whole earth, not with a fence, but with a cloak about it.

London Fancies.

"Cousin Madge" writes [illegible]: "We went to the Salon. The [illegible] a crowd, a well dressed crowd assembled there, a few of whom were listening to the music of the Red Hungarian Band. There was an exhibition of pictures done by members, just enough to go round the walls once. A well-known singer wore a lovely gown of olive-green silk, opening over white satin, and exquisite Turkish embroideries in pink, gold, olive-green and [illegible]. An artist with a Circean face wore white brocade. There was one fancy ball costume in the crowd, so I suppose the wearer was going on to some gathering of a more fantastic kind. A Greek dress attracted some attention because there was so little that was Greek about it. It was a very annoying dress. I longed to give it a good pull at the back. Greek draperies never hung up in the middle as it did I am sure. Or if they did, Greek would meet Greek in the shape of dressmaker and dress wearer and then would come a tug of war. Two æsthetic sisters, dressed alike, hovered about in sad sage-green, apparently unaware that the day for that sort of thing is past and gone. A very pretty woman was so very pretty that I do not remember what she wore.

A Romantic Reconciliation.

Warren B. Westcott and Miss Jane F. Trueman were married recently at Saratoga. Forty years ago they were lovers and engaged, but Mr Westcott jilted Miss Trueman and married a wealthy widow. To vindicate herself Miss Trueman successfully prosecuted a breach of promise suit against Mr Westcott, but refused to accept the damages which were awarded to her. About three years ago Mr. Westcott became a widower. The old love revived in the hearts of both, and they decided to wed, he at the age of 70, and she nearly 60.

A New Trick of the Dressmaker's Trade.

One of the new tricks of the dressmaker's trade is to baste a sheet of wadding and a thin muslin interlining under the back breadths of Empire frocks, plait all three together and secure the lower edge of the lining and wadding to tapes sewed nine or ten inches below the waist. This makes the plaits look full and soft, and is not so obstinate as the bustle, which even in this stage of high civilization is capable of executing such fantastic tricks before high heaven as—but it is not necessary to continue the quotation. Angels are free from earthly troubles.

Princess Beatrice's Sister-in-Law.

Mrs. Crawford goes on: Mdlle. Loisinger is a great beauty. She is like a goddess of Rubens before the divine being fell into flesh. I never saw a finer tone of color or texture than her face, neck and arms. She came here some winters ago, hoping, through General Turr and other Hungarians, to obtain an engagement at the opera. I was asked to write her up, and was taken to see her. The voice was not first-rate, and, as she wanted vibrating capacity, the style was mechanical. But she had splendid plastic points, and her head of hair was a golden fleece. Her laugh was open and good-natured and the teeth milky white. In short, the dream of the bard of Kilkenny of the bunch of ripe strawberries smothered in cream, was realized.

Pertaining to Women.

Russian tea at $4 a pound is the kind used at afternoon receptions in New York.

The women in England exceed the men by 3,000,000.

White is pretty for house dresses all the year around.

The cotillon is only just becoming fashionable in English society.

Pale green is a color worn much by Lady Randolph Churchill this season.

The golden wedding of the Gladstones will give occasion for a Liberal "jubilee" at Hawarden shortly.

Nearly one-half of the stockholders of the Consolidated Railroad, whose headquarters are at Hartford, Ct., are said to be women.

Mrs. Burnett's son, Vivian, has grown tired of being called "Little Lord Fauntleroy." "I'm just Vivian Burnett, that's who I am," he says.

The late J. E. Pfeiffer Londoner, left half a million to his wife—Emily Pfeiffer, the writer of verses—to be used for the advancement of women.

It is whispered among the knowing ones that Mrs. Gladstone's best gown is still the royal blue velvet with which she celebrated her husband's accession to power.

William S. Jackson, the husband of the late Helen Hunt Jackson, better known in the literary world as "H. H.," was married to his third wife in Colorado Springs a day or two ago.

Miss Miriam Samuel, Bachelor of Arts of Bombay University and daughter of a Persian merchant, has gone to London to study medicine with the intention of practising in India.

Two of the most successful college presidents in [illegible] are women: Miss Lottie A. Campbell, [illegible] of Cardwell College at Danville, and Miss A. M. Hicks, President of [illegible] College.

The Queen of Madagascar, who is to be [illegible] a small, slender, light brown woman with a very sad face, a sweet smile, and fond of Paris gowns. She is 26 years old, has been four years a queen and is really worshipped by her people.

Novelties in the Fashions.

Sprays of maiden hair fern in green enamel incrusted with tiny diamonds, is a charming pin.

Low bodices for evening dresses are cut in every possible shape. Some are cut quite low at back and front and filled with tulle gathered to a band at the throat. Some are cut oval to display the shoulders and finished by an old fashioned lace bertha.

The Hadding veil, such an institution for many reasons, can be worn with an unreadiness that. To let it hang with a frill about the neck is well enough, but when drawn closely under the chin and gathered in at the back the effect is nearer the latest fashion.

Great clusters of pond lilies, fiery poppies, hyacinths, field daisies, etc., are lavishly used on ball toilets. The long, transparent green grasses with which these flowers are combined are an excellent background for so much vivid color. Some of the flowers are touched with faint colors almost nature.

Trim little turbans, toques and capotes are the [illegible] worn with these gowns. [illegible] of the dress material can be wrinkled over a stiff frame and finished at the edges by a band of [illegible] or gray velvet and a white or gray bird as the wearer's fancy may dictate—streaks [illegible] and arches his neck in front.

A court train worn recently by the young German [illegible] dress was [illegible] long [illegible] the finest white [illegible] silk, magnificently embroidered [illegible] gold and silver. The price of the material was about $1,000 and the embroidery was done by twelve young girls who were working at it for two months.

The plaids give way before the reign of stripes that [illegible] to dominate in every variety [illegible] shades of gray or gray and white have the preference, these suits being often worn with short coats of [illegible], very severely simple in make, sometimes with a bit of braiding and often trimmed in gray astrachan or some other fur.

Drap de Paris is a new fabric which will commend itself to all lovers of fine goods. It is not knitted, but woven like cloth, and has all the elasticity of jersey cloth. It is woven in ribs of different sizes, coarse and fine, the heavy coarse black being especially suitable for mourning. It comes in all colors and is used for any garment that can be made of jersey cloth.

The full waisted [illegible] are very popular for those who cannot stand the severe style of the tailor made article. These have yokes of [illegible] tucks and of smocking, the fulness belted in at the waist with a wide belt and ornamental buckle. They are made of plain and striped goods, and in many cases embroidered with braid herring bone stitch or have a plastron of Persian trimming.

The Directoire jersey is cut away over a vest and fastened with two high buttons. Matalees of silk [illegible] and merveilleuse are a perfect delight to an ease-loving woman. There is comfort in them and good looks, the yokes are shirred tucked or smocked, and they are confined to the waist with a loose belt or girdle. They are mostly trimmed with lace and are made in all the new desirable shades.

A Cordial Welcome.

Visiting mother-in-law—How glad I am to see you, my dear daughter.

Daughter-in-law—I am so glad to see you. It is so kind in you to travel that long distance just to see me. Take off your things. Now that you are here you must not think of leaving us before the first train in the morning.

Power of Association.

Mrs. De Temper (looking up from the paper)—Well, I declare! Another woman, single handed, has captured a burglar. I should think she would have been killed by the brute, but the paper says the moment she grabbed a poker and made a dash for him his knees trembled and his teeth shook, and he sank to the floor in affright.

Mr. De Temper—He is probably a married man.

"I have an account of a big land slide," said the new reporter. "What head shall I put it under?" "Put it under the 'Real Estate Transfers,'" replied the snake [illegible]

Owing to the crowded condition of our columns we are obliged to set communications in smaller type, and to leave over a large amount of interesting matter, including a communication from Markdale

Every trade, every society and association has its newspaper now-a-days. The latest is the "Canadian Baker and Confectioner," published monthly in Toronto. It is beautifully printed on toned paper, and contains a large amount of interesting information for the trade. One dollar per an.

The Streetsville review is suffering under a heavy rush of spring poetry. Friend Fawcett is publishing it by the yard. The first thirty-six inches appeared last week. Should any regular correspondent of ours send us a like consignment it would tend to raise our suspicions to say the least.

Will the Durham Chronicle, when it desires to give us a free ad. please set it up "according to copy." Kindly correct last weeks advertisement by making it read: The Advance will be given free to newly married couples for six months, not one year as you printed it, and we will be under an eternal debt of gratitude, Bro. Mitchell.

Bro. Fawcett, of Streetsville, spent Sunday last in Flesherton. A rumor was current here that Mr. Fawcett contemplated entering the ministry, but it was a base fabrication. He has sufficient to occupy his mind in ministering to the wants of a fast growing list of subscribers. Mr. Fawcett has evidently struck a good thing in Streetsville, and he is making the county papers of Peel "hunt their hare."

Two weeks ago the Thornbury paper and Meaford Mirror inserted a piece of news to the effect that Mr. Ellis' barn and stables near Kimberley were consumed by fire on the previous Sanday. The two papers are away off their chump. No such accident occurred, and Mr. Ellis' barn and stables are still standing. We have an idea that the reflection seen was that of the new lamp in front of McDonald & Evans' new store, Flesherton. Investigate next time before making any wild assertions, gentlemen.

A lecture will be given in the Town Hall, Flesherton, on Thursday evening, April 23, by Rev. Charles F. Perry, under the auspices of L.O.L. No 883, subject The Jesuit Bill. Rev. Mr Shilton and other gentlemen will also speak Flesherton Orchestra will be in attendance. Admission 15 cents Doors open at 7 p m, lecture to commence at 7.30.

Horse Colts

Mr. Roderick Stewart and Mr. John Adams claim that the two colts mentioned in last weeks Advance, belonging to Mr. Wakely, are not so much ahead of theirs after all. They say wait till Mr Wakely's colts arrive at the same age and then compare them, claiming that as Mr Wakley's colts are so young it is no fair comparison.

Clean Up.

There is considerable spring cleaning and renovating which our town fathers should look after before hot weather approaches. Three dead carcasses in the northern suburbs require interment. The sidewalk is blocked with sawlogs opposite the sawmill, and the sidewalk at the Boyne Bridge is in a very lame condition, having lost a portion of itself. This latter requires immediate attention.

Baseball.

A meeting of those interested in baseball is called for Saturday night at 8 o'clock in D. Clayton's harness shop. A full attendance of lovers of the sphere and diamond is requested It is thought possible to form a league of the four clubs named, with possibly some other additions. Priceville has expressed her willingness. What does Markdale and Dundalk think of the scheme?

Social.

The Ladies' Aid Society of the Methodist Church held a social here on Wednesday evening last, at the residence of Mr J.H. Heard. A goodly number of Flesherton's citizens were present and enjoyed a pleasant evening. After the good things were gotten outside of, the partakers retired to different apartments, to "chase the glowing hours with flying—tongues," and indulge in harmless games. When they were sufficed with these they all dispersed at a seasonable hour. The proceeds amounted to $11.

It is Rumored That.

The R.T. of T. have really decided to produce "Ten Nights in a Barroom" at no distant date. This an old play, but a large number of the young and rising generation have never witnessed it and it will no doubt draw a big house.

M. H has lost his whiskers.

The "sap heads" have committed no depredations so far as The Advance knows.

Dan. M is fixing up the cage He will probably have the bird soon.

Methodist Church Matters.

Now that the debt incurred last fall in bricking the Methodist parsonage has been wiped out the ladies have turned their attention to other matters. Last week witnessed some internal improvements to the church. The pulpit and choir have been raised some six inches, the projection around the pulpit ruling extended and new carpet laid down. Mr Howard, our new planing mill man, was the contractor, and did the work very neatly.

The big Arbitration

The arbitration upon Derby's registration, which has created so much talk during the past nine months, came off at Markdale on Saturday last and resulted in a victory for Mr Wright. The case has created a great deal of interest. Mr Beaty bet $100 against $50 that Mr. Wright's horse (Derby) was not properly registered Some difficulty was experienced in securing a third man for the arbitration, but this was eventually accomplished in the person of Geo. Inglis, Esq., of Owen Sound, and the matter terminated on Saturday with the above result. Mr. Beatty will no doubt take his defeat philosophically.

King of the Castle.

Mr. Thorp Wright is at present on top of the heap all round. A short time ago a gentleman in the vicinity of Walters Falls, it is alleged, was disseminating false statements as to the age of Mr Wright's horse, Derby, and this coming to Mr. Wright's ears he instructed a friend to procure a bet of any amount with the first named individual, which was eventually secured, the parties depositing five dollars on a hundred dollar bet. However, the gentleman who made the statements did not back his fiver with the balance, and Mr Wright is now chuckling over possession of said five and the crowing defeat of his opponent

The Way of all Flesh.

One of Artemesia's oldest residents passed away on Saturday morning last, in the person of Mr. Archibald Cairns, who has lived in the vicinity of Flesherton for the last 34 years. Deceased was born in Fifeshire, Scotland, in the year 1811, and came to Canada forty years ago, settling in the township of Essa, where he remained four years, and from whence he removed to Artemesia. For some months Mr. Cairns has been extremely feeble and confined to his bed. He was father of Councillor Cairns. Deceased was buried on Monday in the Presbyterian burial ground, Orange Valley, when a large number of old neighbors and friends followed the corpse to its last resting place beside that of his wife, who died 27 years ago.

A Radical Change.

A big change has taken place during the past week in the bus and livery business here. Mr. W.P. Crossley has sold out his share in the livery business at the station to Mr. McInnes and has purchased the bus line from Mr. P. Munshaw. Mr. Crossley's name itself is a guarantee that the line will be run in the best public interests, and the change be a satisfactory one. The new order of affairs began yesterday. He has also charge of the express business, and hopes to [illegible] some better arrangements than [illegible] in force since the new order [illegible] The express office will be in D. Clayton's harness shop. We bespeak a hearty support for friend Crossley, and feel satisfied that he will get it, as he can be [illegible] pended on to attend strictly to [illegible] ness in a business like manner.

The Other Side.

With regard to an item which appeared in last week's Advance, headed "A case of hardship," we would say that since then more facts have been gleaned in reference to the matter, which handles the "hardship" down to a mere bagatelle. There are always two sides to a question of this kind, and one story is good until another is told. The main items were correct, but as for the gentleman having been turned away from his own door, that story appears to have [illegible] fiction. It was at his own [illegible] left his residence He is occupying a situation in a western not having got as far as West Territory. The item referred to was published with a view to [illegible] person, and when such is [illegible] ingly done The Advance is always willing to make the amende honorable.

To the Editor of The Advance.

SIR—Some time ago an article, written by the Kimberley correspondent, appeared in The Advance insinuating that the Orangemen of Eugenia were not willing to pay for the music rendered at their entertainment by the Kimberley [illegible] At that time they had not been paid, but it was their own fault. One of the committee appointed to look after the music asked a member of the Kimberley club as the Eugenia choir, owing to unavoidable circumstances, was not in a position to get up the music on what terms they would furnish the music for the occasion. The reply was he could not tell until he had talked the matter over with the others of the club. The Award.

We the undersigned arbitrators to whom the thirteenth day of April A.D. was referred the matter in dispute between Andrew Beattie of the township of Artemesia in the County of Grey, farmer, and Thos. Wright of the same place, farmer, respecting the registration of certain stallion known as Lord Derby, and having heard the evidence adduced by both parties do hereby find, determine and award that the said stallion, Lord Derby, is a properly registered horse.

We also find that as the said Andrew Beattie may have had some ground on which to base his charges that each party pay his own costs and that the costs of the arbitration, amounting to the sum of thirty-six dollars, be paid by the said

Balsam Valley Items.

From our own Correspondent:

Things in nature are changing now; the beautiful garment which covered the earth for the past few months is fading, or rather is getting it changed for one of a darker hue. Seeding has not commenced yet; but we are anxiously waiting for the frost to go out of the ground. Sugarmakers are still in the bush and they mean to stay there as long as maple trees give them any encouragement. Some of them have had the experience of Lazarus for a few seconds—that's what taffy sprees do. Mr. Alex Nevin[illegible] of our esteemed citizens, is no longer in Balsam Valley. Eliza Jane Pugh Gets $750 from Old George McGowan for Breach of Promise.

A Kingston despatch says: At the Assize Court to-day (Friday) Eliza Jane Pugh, aged 37, recovered $750 and costs from George McGowan, aged 60, a neighbor, deaf and decrepid. Eliza, wearing a long cloak and a dashing Gainsborough hat, told of the engagement of the old wooer to her. They met first at a funeral, and George besought her to let him see her often. She assented, and fortnightly, rain or shine, the ancient suitor hitched his chair close to Eliza's and talked with her about farm produce and a little about love. Summoning up courage, he at length asked Eliza if he dare ask her to marry him. She asked him if he liked any one better than her. He said "No." On his next visit he asked her to be his wife, and she accepted him. The wedding was held back at his request until a house was finished. About Christmas, 1887, he wanted to get married, but she asked him to wait until after Christmas. When she was ready for the ceremony to take place he said he was sick. At last he asked to be relieved from his contract. He offered her $1,000. She refused it, but would have taken $2,000. No letters passed between the pair. One day, in talking to McGowan's sister, that lady said George was looking for a housekeeper, and Eliza jocularly remarked, "Send him along this way." This remark was made before their engagement. McGowan made her presents, giving her a gold watch and chain. She returned the chain because it was his daughter's. He said he was sick, but she did not think he was very sick, as he always looked the same to her. She had refused an offer of marriage from one T. Stevenson. Mr. Millsap, a widower, had also visited her, but she never kept company with him as a lover. In cross-examination Mr. McIntyre, Q.C., asked Miss Pugh, "Are you willing to marry him now?" Witness—"I like defendant well enough, but before I would marry him he would have to give an account of his past conduct." Her wedding outfit cost $50. Some minor evidence was submitted, but no defence was set up. The jury awarded their verdict after a short absence.

AND SHE LOVES HIM STILL.

He Gouged Out Both Her Eyes, but She Came to See Him in Prison.

An Auburn, N. Y., telegram says: A large, middle-aged woman, blind in both eyes and led by a girl of 18, applied at the prison gate yesterday morning for admission. She asked to see William Bohan, her husband, who was received in a draft from Sing Sing last October and was serving a 27-years' sentence for gouging her eyes out. Because of this terrible crime, Bohan has been ostracised by his fellow-convicts. Even thieves, burglars and murderers show their detestation of a man who could treat his wife so. For the past two weeks Bohan has been an inmate of the hospital, suffering from a severe attack of pneumonia. He has been in communication with his wife, and when she heard he was sick she determined to visit him, arriving at the prison yesterday accompanied by her niece. She was permitted to visit her husband in the hospital, and their meeting was very affectionate. He walked up to her and, placing his hands on her cheeks, kissed her several times. He then led her to a chair near his bed and they spent an hour in earnest conversation, during which the convict-husband cried like a child. The woman's niece, a sister's daughter, received the man very coolly, and through the interview she never spoke to her uncle. To a reporter Mrs. Bohan said that, while she was unable to account for her feelings, she still loved the man and would live with him again to morrow if he were released from prison. She added that it was hard to keep him in prison, as it did her no good and has an injury to him. She excused his crime by saying that he was intoxicated, else he never would have injured her.

"When sober," said she, "he always treated me kindly."

She added, that when sent to prison he deeded to her all his property, amounting to about $7 000. She said: "A wife's a wife, and I can't help my feelings. I love my husband still, and would do anything for him. As soon as I am able, I shall set about obtaining his pardon and, if successful, we shall live together as before."

DIED AMONG STRANGERS.

A Toronto Woman's Sad Story and Lonely Death.

A Harrisville despatch says: Mrs. Annie Gardner, aged 32, was found dead in bed at this place on Friday morning. Five years ago she was a happy wife and the mother of two bright boys. She then lived with her husband in Toronto. An estrangement occurred and one night her husband took the two boys and came to Michigan. The distracted wife and mother followed, and after a weary search, located him near Green Bush a small village six miles south of Harrisville. Mrs. Gardner came by steamer to Harrisville, but her husband learned of her arrival and at once fled to Saginaw, where the two boys afterwards died. The mother followed the husband to Saginaw, only to learn of the death of her two boys and that the father had buried them in an obscure spot. She, after a long search, found the grave and had their remains exhumed and buried in the cemetery. Then the heart broken mother returned to this place, where her sad story gained her shelter and friends. She was still young, but care and sorrow had whitened her hair, and her bowed form seemed more like that of a person far advanced in years than that of a woman of her age. Then came her death, and the coroner's jury returned a verdict that Mrs Gardner died through the visitation of God by natural causes.

Believed to be Dying.

A Brantford despatch says: Almira Winegarner, the mother of the child which she and the grandmother are accused of murdering, is so ill that little hopes are held out for her recovery. She has been released from jail, but it is not thought that her life can be much prolonged.

STANLEY AND EMIN.

Further Particulars of the Explorer's Wanderings—Emin Contented to Remain.

A London cable says: Stanley in his letter says his expedition was 160 days in the forest—one continuous, unbroken, compact forest. The grass land was traversed in eight days. North and south the forest extends from Nyangiva to the southern borders of Monbutta. East and west it embraces all from the Congo at the mouth of the Aruwhimi to about east longitude 29°, latitude 40°. The superficial extent of the tract described totally covered by forest is 246,000 square miles. North of the Congo, between Upoto and Aruwhimi, the forest embraces another 20,000 square miles. Between Yambunga and Nyanza Stanley came across five distinct languages. The land slopes gently from the crest of the plateau above the Nyanza down to the Congo River. Fifty miles from his camp on the Nyanza Stanley saw a towering mountain, its summit covered with snow, probably 18,000 feet above the sea. It is called Ruevenzori, and will prove a rival to Kilimandjaro. Stanley does not think this is the Gordon Bennett Mountain in Gambaragara.

Stanley says Emin Pasha has two battalions of regulars, the first consisting of about 750 rifles and the second of 640 men. Besides these he has a respectable force of irregulars, artisans, clerks and servants. "Altogether," Emin said, "if I consent to go away from here we shall have about 8,000 people with us. We have such a large number of women and children—probably 10,000 people altogether—how can they all be brought out of here?" Stanley told Emin carriers for the women and children were not needed. The women could walk and the children could be loaded on donkeys. Stanley strove hard to persuade Emin to leave, but the latter brought up various objections. He desired to send away with Stanley 100 Egyptians who underminded his authority and who wanted to leave. But the regulars were having such a good time that he thought they would not care to leave. Emin did not care to leave the regulars behind. He feared they would fight among themselves and that would be their ruin.

Stanley concluded, "I left Mr. Jephson 13 Soudanese, and sent a message to be read to the troops as the Pasha requested. Everything else is left until I return with the united expedition to the Nyanza, within two months. The Pasha proposed to visit Fort Bodo, taking Mr. Jephson with him. At Fort Bodo I have left instructions to the officers to destroy the fort and accompany the Pasha to the Nyanza. I hope to meet them all again on the Nyanza, as I intend making a short cut to the Nyanza along a new route."

A COMMON-SENSE LETTER.

To the Editor: -I see that newspaper articles are again making their appearance calling attention to matters pertaining to health as well as to the means whereby disease may be removed and good health preserved. I am thereby reminded that I have received from time to time pamphlet publications issued by the well-known firm of H. H. Warner & Co., which dwell upon the history and growth of kidney diseases; showing how such is the cause of consumption, heart, brain and nervous disorders, which can only be successfully treated by removing the primary disease from the kidneys. At the same time care is taken to remind the reader that Warner's Safe Cure is the only means whereby the physician or the individual can successfully prevent and cure this class of disease.

Whilst I have personal cause to feel grateful to Warner's Safe Cure for the benefit which I derived from it when suffering from kidney troubles last spring, I cannot see, since that remedy is already so well known in every household, why the parties interested in its manufacture should continue to expend money in calling attention to what the public already knows so well. I am aware, Mr. Editor, that the members of the medical profession are seldom disposed to give due credit to proprietary medicines, but public confidence is likely to be even more shaken in those learned gentlemen since the startling disclosures in the Robinson poisoning cases were made in Somerville, Mass.

Here it was discovered, through the efforts of an insurance company, that eight cases of death from arsenical poisoning had occurred -seven of them in one family, and within five years, and the other that of a relative wherein the true cause of death had not been even suspected by prominent physicians who were in attendance, but who treated the cases for other causes, and finally, when death occurred, issued certificates for such causes as pneumonia, typhoid fever, meningitis, etc.

After such an evidence of the utter incompetency of those physicians who were regarded as experts in their profession, I cannot conceive why it will be longer necessary for further advertising to be done in behalf of Warner's Safe Cure, since I deem the Somerville disclosure to be the best possible endorsement of the good sense manifested by those who take matters of health in their own hands and use a remedy which experience has shown to be fully adapted for the purposes intended, instead of trusting themselves in experimental hands. EXPERIENCE.

DOMINION PARLIAMENT.

Mr. Choquette, on motion for the adoption of the report of the Printing Committee, moved in amendment that the report be referred back to the committee with instructions to inquire into and report upon the circumstances connected with the dismissal of Messrs. Tremblay and Poirier, French translators.

The Speaker ruled the amendment out of order.

The motion was carried.

Mr. O'Brien, in moving for the correspondence with reference to the arrears of annuities due to Indians who surrendered their lands under the Robinson Treaty, said it was a shame that these people should be kept out of their rights simply because the matter was in dispute between the Dominion and Provincial Governments.

Mr. Dawson said that the opening up of the country north of Lake Superior to settlement was effecting a great change in the circumstances of the Indians there. The game upon which they relied almost wholly for subsistence was fast disappearing, and they would soon become dependent on the Government for support in the same way as the Indians of the plains. He urged that some arrangement should be come to for the payment of the arrears due to these Indians.

Sir John Macdonald said—No doubt some hardship had been caused by the non-payment of the arrears in the case referred to. The difficulty in regard to the settlement of this claim had existed for many years, and was present to the mind of the leader of the late Government (Mr. Mackenzie), who placed a sum of money at the disposal of these Indians for their temporary relief, pending the settlement of their claim. Some correspondence had taken place with the Ontario Government on the subject, but it appears that the Government of Quebec was also concerned, and correspondence with them would be necessary. He hoped that in further negotiations, soon to be had with the Ontario Government, the subject would receive consideration.

The motion was carried.

Sir John Macdonald said—Mr. Speaker, it is my lamentable duty to have to announce the decease of the Hon. John Henry Pope, my friend and colleague. Although the event was not unexpected, yet the blow is so severe that when it falls I feel I cannot say more just now. I shall therefore move the adjournment of the House. I have no doubt that an opportunity will be taken by myself and by some hon. members on both sides to express the great regret which this House and the country feel in the loss of Mr. Pope. In consequence of the great desire, I believe, on both sides to get through with the business of the session as speedily as it properly can be, I will move now that the House adjourn, instead of moving to-morrow, and as there are some private Bills standing which ought to be reached, I will consent to the House taking the first hour after recess for that purpose.

Mr. Laurier I certainly deem it my duty to second the motion which has just been made. As the right hon. Premier has said, the death of Mr. Pope was not at all unexpected, and under such circumstances the event does not present the harrowing grief which the sudden termination of a useful career would be sure to produce. At the same time the country will realize that it is no ordinary or common life which has been ended. As an opportunity will, no doubt, be given the House again to express its views I shall say no more at present.

Mr. Mitchell—I feel that in this event I have lost a very old personal friend. The deceased gentleman occupied a prominent place in every public movement in Canada for the last twenty-five years, and was universally respected, and passing from the Cabinet he has left scarcely a man possessing qualifications superior to his in a certain line. We have looked forward to this event for the last few days with very deep regret. I am sure the country will unite in regretting the decease of one who, had he lived and enjoyed his health, would have continued to perform those useful services to the country which he has so faithfully performed for many years.

Sir Richard Cartwright intimated that on going into Supply to-morrow he would, without offering an amendment, briefly refer to certain facts in connection with the recent 3 per cent. loan, and he hoped the Finance Minister would be able to make certain explanations which he deemed necessary to the better understanding of the subject.

Sir John Thompson, on motion for the second reading of the Franchise Bill, explained that the object of the Bill was to make the printed electoral lists now ready in the Printing Bureau available for revision during the present year. It provided that as soon after the 1st of June as practicable, and availing himself of all the sources of information which the present law provides should be made available, the revising officer shall proceed to make a supplementary list of those who are to be added to the list as now printed and of those who are to be struck off. These lists so prepared by him are to be transmitted to the proper officer in Ottawa, to be printed as additions to and corrections of the list as now set up. The lists, so amended, shall be forwarded to the returning officer in sufficient numbers to enable him to post them in proper places and to distribute them through the polling districts to the proper persons, and from these the final lists upon revision are prepared. It was proposed that the revision should take place in this way during the present year.

Mr. Edgar said the most acceptable Bill would be one repealing the Franchise Act. The amendments proposed were no doubt necessary to carry out the new system for printing the lists. He would, however, ask the House to strike out the clause providing that the preliminary list shall be made up by the revising barrister from the assessment roll and from any information he might obtain from any source. He would suggest that in making the lists regard be had to the last revised voters' list, the last assessment rolls and that, for the purpose of striking out those who had died, the revising barrister should procure copies of official lists of deaths. Beyond this, he should have no power to make alterations, additions or corrections, except under statutory declaration made by the persons who shall have personal knowledge of facts.

Mr. Charlton said the Franchise Act was cumbrous, expensive and unnecessary. He believed the Government should adopt manhood suffrage.

Mr. Mills (Bothwell) argued that the Government in adopting the franchise for the Dominion had deviated from the course laid down at the Quebec convention. There was but one rational course, and that was to adopt the Provincial lists. The present law was a nuisance which should be abated.

Mr. Colter said that if the lists were revised in Haldimand this year, at least a thousand new names would be added.

Sir John Macdonald said it was unfortunate if the general question of franchise should be brought up on the Bill amending the Franchise Act. There was no danger of a general election in the near future, especially after the strong vote of confidence in the Government the other day. They would last for a year or two. (Laughter.)

Mr. Mitchell—Some of these votes were given under protest.

Sir John Macdonald—Yes, but we got the votes. The protests stand for what they ars worth. I ask that this Bill be considered upon its merits.

Mr. Laurier said that the position taken was that the Franchise Act was bad beyond possible remedy. He looked on franchise as a civil right which must be determined by each Province. The tendency was in the direction of manhood suffrage. The standard provided by the Dominion was not up to the standard provided by the Provinces. Though he claimed to be a Liberal of the Liberals, he would not impose upon Quebec manhood suffrage, because the convictions of the great majority of the people of that Province were against it. When he looked at France he saw that the great fault of that people was in passing from a limited franchise to manhood suffrage. The policy of England was to enlarge the suffrage gradually. Under such circumstances he moved that the Bill be not read now, but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this House the Electoral Franchise Act should be repealed, and it is preferable to revert to the plan of utilizing for elections to this House the Provincial voters' lists.

Mr. Small moved the second reading of the Bill for the relief of William Gordon Lowry.

Sir John Thompson said Divorce Bills were frequently passed by the House without the members having made themselves acquainted with the facts of the case. It was true that each case was fully inquired into by the committee of the Senate, and evidence was taken, but that did not relieve the House from the responsibility of allowing such legislation to pass. It was the imperative duty of the House to inquire into all the facts of the case as fully as if they were sitting in the capacity of a jury in a trial. After having examined the evidence in the case now before the House, he was satisfied that it was not strong enough to establish the charge of adultery, and there was room for a pretty strong presumption of collusion between the parties. Under the circumstances, he would oppose the passage of the Bill.

Mr. Jamieson said the Senate Committee, before whom the witnesses had appeared in person, had unanimously recommended that a divorce be granted.

Sir John Thompson said the Bill only passed the Senate Chamber by a bare majority.

Mr. Weldon and Mr. Davis concurred in the view of the Minister of Justice regarding the value of the evidence in the case under consideration.

On the call for yeas and nays, the motion for the second reading was lost—Yeas, 79; nays, 80.

Mr. Small moved that the Bill for the relief of Wm. G. Lowry be placed on the order for second reading to-morrow. He explained that he made the motion because, although the Bill was negatived in the second reading yesterday, he was informed by a number of members who then voted against the Bill that after having read the evidence they would support it.

The motion was carried on division.

Sir Richard Cartwright inquired if the Minister of Finance was yet in a position to make his promised statement in regard to the points he (Sir Richard Cartwright) had raised on the terms of the 3 per cent. loan.

Mr. Foster said he had read very carefully and had considered along with the officers of his department the remarks that were made by the hon. gentleman with reference to the loan of 1888 and the paragraph in the prospectus referring to the purchase of that loan for sinking fund purposes. In order to understand the matter more clearly, it would be well to go back beyond the loan of 1888 and take cognizance of the fact that our earlier loans had, in the different years in which they were negotiated, sinking funds attached, by which the Government were pledged to set apart certain sums of money each year to purchase securities, which were to be set off as against that particular loan, and this, together with the accruing interest from year to year, were to constitute a sinking fund as regards the set off, and as regards each loan. At the present time we were face to face with this fact, that as a result of these conditions we have set apart from our loans on an average about two million dollars per year, that is to say we have to buy out of stocks or securities what would be equal to two millions of dollars each year on an average to offset the loans which had sinking fund attachments. The prospectuses issued in connection with the other loan had not that clause, which bound the Government to buy out of the loans so long as they were not above par, but left it at the option of the Government when above par to buy or not, as they chose. As a matter of fact, when our stocks in 1885, or about that period, came up to or above par, sinking funds were bought out of our own stocks. Still, even though they were above par last year, we paid for sinking fund for our 4 per cent. stocks as high as 114½, or thereabouts. The prospectus of the loan of 1888, now under consideration, carried out the same principle as was observed in the prospectuses of the preceding loans. Although he was willing to grant that it was stated a little more explicitly than in the clauses of the preceding prospectuses, still there was this to be understood, that it had been the practice from the earliest time to pledge the Government to buy from stocks at or below par, and to use the option to purchase when they went above par. Here was a loan, the minimun price of which was fixed at 92½, and which must perforce be a stock below par, and the clause in the prospectus simply expressed the intention of the Government to purchase for the sinking fund out of that stock, which must necessarily be a stock below par. The Government did not hold that they were bound to purchase out of that stock for the purpose of the sinking fund if that stock was appreciated unreasonably, or if it was apparent that there was a combination for the purpose of raising the stock unduly. With reference to what the hon. gentleman had said as to the exhaustion of the loan long before the fixed time for its termination, that would hold good with reference to most of our stocks. For instance, in some classes of fours, which expire in 1903, we would exhaust them eleven or twelve years before the expiring of the loan, and, of course, we have reduced our debt by that much. His own opinion and the opinion of his officers was that, taking all things into consideration, there was no ground for alarm and the possible condemnation of the Government, which was rather fore-shadowed by the hon. gentleman.

Sir Richard Cartwright said that at present he would only say a few words on the subject. He feared that the Minister of Finance had not at all comprehended the probabilities, and he would not now speak of the possibilities involved in the arrangement which had been entered into. A good deal of what he said was not relevant to the subject, and several of his opinions, he was afraid, he would at a later period have to dispute. Of course it was quite true that it had been our habit to buy our own stocks, and it was very well that should be done under certain circumstances, but the hon. gentleman had failed to entirely appreciate the enormous difference between the engagement we had now entered into and our engagements of previous years. This engagement was unlimited. It had no word of restriction whatever, and it bound us to apply, under the ordinary sinking of one half per cent. per annum, the sinking fund which probably amounted to 10 per cent. per annum towards the purchase of our loan. The one point which the hon. gentleman made, that at this present moment we were able to buy at 94½ or even lower, would prove, he was afraid, a very broken reed to lean upon. The hon. gentleman was no doubt aware that the course of business was such that when a loan of the magnitude of £4,000.000 sterling was floated in the English market a good deal of stock would for a considerable period be loose upon the market, and might, as in this case, be re-purchased at even a lower rate than was obtained for it in selling. It was not for the first few months that the result of the hon. gentleman's arrangement was likely to be felt, and no sort of conclusion could be based on what could be done at present. It was when these loans had got into the hands of permanent investors, and when they found that we were compelled to expend these enormous sums from year to year, that the full results of what the hon. gentleman or his predecessor had done would become clearly manifest. He would not say at present how far the Finance Minister was warranted in importing words or a qualification into a prospectus so clearly as had been done here. There was a good deal to be considered before he would affirm or dissent from the position the hon. gentleman had taken. He regretted exceedingly that it was necessary that a Minister of Finance in Canada should use words which, under any conceivable circumstances or in the remotest degree, should savor of a repudiation of an agreement published broadcast from one end of the United Kingdom to the other. He did not accuse the Minister of that, but there were perplexities ahead of him with respect to the question which he did not at all appear to appreciate. He proposed at the earliest opportunity, on going into Supply, to record his opinion as to the risks we were running, and the probable contingencies involved in this loan.

On the item of $23 000 to pay the costs of arbitration between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway,

Sir Richard Cartwright said there must be a very large sum involved if the Government were going so expensively into the matter. He asked the nature and extent of the claim

Sir John Macdonald replied that the Canadian Pacific Railway claimed that the British Columbia section, when handed over to them, was not up to the standard required by the contract with the Government. They claimed four or five million dollars.

The item passed.

BOTH BAD SHOTS.

Pistol Practice Between a Robber and an Express Agent.

A Winnipeg despatch says: At Indian Head yesterday morning a bold attempt was made to rob the C. P. R and Dominion Express Company's office of a large sum of money. Agent Lewis had retired at 11 30 leaving three packages of money in charge of Night Operator Ross for shipment. About midnight a man came to the waiting-room office and rapped. On opening the upper half of the door a masked man presented a full cocked revolver, covering Ross, and said, "I want that money you have in the drawer without a word." Ross went to the drawer across the office, keeping his eye on the robber until he got hold of his revolver lying in the drawer with the money. He then immediately blew out the lamp, and the robber fired instantly, just missing the operator. Ross returned the fire just as the robber turned to go out of the waiting-room. The bullet penetrated the door behind him. Ross then followed him to the platform, where they exchanged shots again, the second bullet from the robber penetrating Ross' hat. Police have arrived from Qu'Appelle and will take up the trail by which the robber escaped in the darkness.

May a Man Starve Himself?

An Atlanta paper says: "The long and fatal fast of John Adams (under arrest for some monetary transaction) has excited the wonder of the public, and various comments on the course of those who had him in charge are heard. Are they responsible for his death. That question was freely discussed about Atlanta yesterday, and the opinions expressed were varied. Many people thought that the officers in whose care Adams was are responsible for his death. Others thought not, arguing that if Adams wanted to kill himself he had that right. Could he have been kept alive? Physicians say he could."

THAT OFFER OF $5,000.

Our readers will doubtless call to mind the offer so widely advertised for the past ten years by H. H. Warner & Co., the proprietors of Warner's Safe Remedies, that they would pay $5,000 to any person who would prove to an impartial referee that they had ever published a testimonial that was not genuine so far as they knew.

This offer had the ring of honesty about it, and as the matter has an especial interest just now we give a copy of the offer as it appears in the Messrs. H. H. Warner & Co.'s pamphlet:

"AN OFFER OF $5,000.00.

Every Testimonial published by us is Bona Fide, and, so far as we know, is absolutely true. To any one who will prove the contrary to an impartial referee we will give $5,000. H. H. WARNER & CO.

Rochester, N.Y., January 2, 1888.

We ask the reader's careful attention to the following testimonials, as bearing on the offer, and their unbiased opinion of the same with reference to the $5,000.

STRATHCLAIR, P.O., Manitoba, April 17th, 1888.—As I have been cured of Bright's Disease, I know a great many more who could be cured by Warner's Safe Cure if the medicine was brought before their notice.—JOHN L. WILSON.

HAMILTON (105 Elgin Street), Ont., July 6th, 1888.—I have been troubled with Kidney Disease in its worst form for from three to four years. For six months I could not attend to my business at all. As a last resort I tried Warner's Safe Cure, and found almost instant relief. I consider Warner's Safe Cure the best medicine known for all diseases of the kidneys.—A. J. DIAMOND.

PORT HOPE, June 21st, 1888.—Between two and three years ago I was suffering a great deal of distress across the loins and Kidneys. I was recommended Warner's Safe Cure, and before taking two bottles I passed a stone from the bladder, very hard, and have suffered nothing of any account since.—E. PHILS.

KINGSTON, July 28th, 1888.—Two years ago my wife was confined to the bed for 8 months the most of the time. She suffered great pain across the kidneys with a burning sensation in the abdomen. Her case was pronounced by her attendant physician to be one of the worst cases of diseased kidneys and prolapsus uteri. I advised her to try Warner's Safe Cure, and before she had taken two bottles was much better. She continued its use until she has taken over a dozen, and is now well and strong, and able to attend to all the cares of our home.—THOS HELORM (lumber dealer).

There is no getting away from such testimony as the above. The offer is genuine. In fact, Messrs. H. H. Warner & Co. have always requested that doubters should write direct to persons giving testimonials (enclosing stamp), and who are of necessity, in the great majority of cases, totally unacquainted with the firm.

The Perquisites of an Earl.

We had a very pretty little garden at our lodgings by the gate of Warwick Castle. It was green with holly and other shrubs, and in it the yellow jasmine bloomed all the winter through. It was sunny and cosy, being sheltered on two sides by the high outer wall of the castle grounds. Over this wall, the castle peacocks, both blue and white, came daily, lending to our small domain a mediæval air. While to us they were most welcome, to our landlady they brought only disaster, for they foraged on her cauliflowers, and in the end destroyed them all. "Why do you not complain of them?" we replied in answer to her complainings. "Why do you not demand pay for damages?" Enter a complaint against the peacocks of an earl! Demand pay for what they had eaten! The very thought of so doing overpowered our good landlady. None but a native of that rampant republic, the United States of America, could dream of such a thing! There are drawbacks to the felicity of being an earl's neighbor. Not only must one submit to the depredations of his peacocks, but of his foxes upon the poultry yard. Our landlady said that, in the part of her native Yorkshire where she was born, hundreds of poultry were killed yearly by the foxes preserved for hunting. The game laws of England are imperious and weigh heavily upon the cottager with his few fowls.—F. A. H., in April Wide Awake.

A Lacking Ingredient.

"Talk about wives," said Farmer Hawbuck, "I've got one wife in a million. Why, she gits up in the mornin', milks seventeen cows and gets breakfast for twenty hard-workin' men before 6 o'clock, by gum." "She must be a very robust woman, Hawbuck," remarked one of his hearers. "On the contrary," put in the farmer; "she is pale and delikit-like. Gosh, ef that woman was strong, I dunno what work she couldn't do."—Harper's Weekly.

"If I knock three times on the coffin-lid during the church service you must let me out," said James Dailey, of Providence, as he was nearing his end the other day. Had James knocked four times his wishes might have been in doubt. But he didn't knock at all, and his neighbors buried him.

CURRENT TOPICS.

A LOUISIANA court has decided that in that State title to any goods passes upon the first payment and that after that is made the buyer may do what he pleases with the goods. This has put instalment dealers into a cold sweat.

MISS AMELIE RIVES' "The Quick or the Dead," long an object of English curiosity, is now published in London with a preface by the author, alleging that in her book the pure will see purity and the foul-minded foulness.

A "RAMBLING courtship" was described by a young man in Croydon, England, defendant for breach of promise, as "walking out with a young woman to see if the disposition would suit each other, and to see whether at the right time anything would come of it." He claimed to have conducted a rambling courtship only.

HARRIET MCKAY, a Scotch girl aged 28, stole a man's clothes while he was asleep, and went and offered herself as a soldier. She passed the examination all right until the doctor's turn came, and he handed the adventuress, who is tall and comely, and belongs to New Zealand, over to the London police.

THE twenty-eight-story building scheme, which was so laughed at when the architect first made it public, is expected to materialize in Minneapolis during the present year. Financial backing has been secured and an office opened, where plans are exhibited which show the outline of 728 rooms, each of which opens from the interior court and has a window on the outside.

WILLIAM CLARKE, discussing in the Political Science Quarterly the progress of Socialism in England, says: "The State in England at this present moment provides, for every one needing them, midwifery, nursery, education, board and lodging, vaccination, medicine, public worship, amusements, burials, and carriage of goods and money"—all of which were once private functions.

IN a trial of the new garbage crematory at Jacksonville, Fla., the apparatus, with the use of less than a quarter of a cord of wood, reduced in one hour to a few ashes twelve barrels of night soil, five barrels of garbage, one barrel of chickens, one barrel of spoiled fish, four dogs, one box of meat, four alligators and five loads of refuse matter, including street sweepings, etc., two of these being double loads, making in all 7,800 pounds. Jacksonvillians think that this solves the sewage and garbage problem for their city.

THE Hartford Courant publishes a letter from John Bright to his son, who was studying boot-making in Hartford, which had not before been made public. Speaking of the English policy on the tariff, Mr. Bright says in it: "The gain to our wage-receiving class during this period has been enormous, and during the recent period of depression they have suffered far less than at other times when our industries have been under a cloud. We shall probably go back to protection about the time when your people go back to slavery."

A LOST color has been discovered. Artists and scientific men have long wondered about the beautiful "azzurrino" found in the ruins of Pompeii. M. Fouque, the mineralogist, with a mixture of silicate or copper and of lime, has now obtained the brilliant crystalline "azure" of Pompeii. It is a tint perfectly unchangeable, and identical with the Alexandrian blue which was known to the Ptolemies, and imported into Italy in the first years of the Christian era. The hue is "sky of heaven:" in fact, like Naples itself, pezzo di cielo caduto in terra.

BISHOP TEMPLE, of London, relates that when he was once worshipping in an east end church where a hearty musical service is a distinguishing feature, he joined in the singing to the best of his ability. He has a stentorian voice, and the effect of his efforts on those sitting near him may be imagined. At the conclusion of the second verse of the hymn the patience of a workingman on his immediate left seemed fairly exhausted. Not recognizing the dignitary beside him, the poor man, in sheer desperation, gave the Bishop a sharp dig in the ribs, and the latter, on turning round for an explanation, was thus addressed in subdued but distinct tones: "I say, gub'ner, you dry up, you're spoiling the whole show."

ELECTRICITY is to be put to still another use—that of welding metals. The ends of the pieces of metal to be welded are brought into contact; then the current is drawn through them, and when it is established they are separated slightly. Thus an arc is formed and great heat ensues, and when the current is shut off, and the heated ends are pressed together, the weld is completed. In the tests that have been made two-inch bar-iron, as also pieces of brass and copper, were successfully welded. The whole process is said to be one of marvellous simplicity and wonderful completeness. The value and utility of such a discovery, especially in the manipulation of copper, are certain to be recognized.

SPEAKING of his recent address at the Eighty Club, the Star of London says that there is always something intensely dramatic and picturesque about the appearance of Lord Rosebery. Somehow or other, when one looks at the clean-shaven and impassive face—surmounted by those strange eyes—cold and warm, inscrutable and eloquent, dull and sparkling—one inevitably thinks of those weird heroes of Balzac that cut their way to fame by sheer dint of courage, coolness, audacity and adaptability. His speech was a delight. It flowed over with fun, sharp hits, adroit and dexterous phrases, and everybody giggled in that subdued fashion which is the etiquette at Eighty Club dinners. Never has Lord Rosebery made a more successful little speech.

THREE hundred miles an hour is the proposed speed for the electric postal railroad of the future. An experimental line has been erected at Laurel, twenty miles from Baltimore, Md. A compromise between the pneumatic tube and the ordinary railroad carries a miniature train of two cars solely for mails and light parcels, without any attendance. The road has three rails, one above the car for carrying the current, and two below which carry the cars. The cars are built of sheet-iron and are two feet square and twenty-one feet long. Speed will be regulated and power or brakes applied by electricity solely. If the experiment at Laurel succeeds it is stated that similar roads will be laid between Baltimore and Washington and elsewhere.

THE committee of the American Medico-Legal Society, appointed to consider the best method of executing the death penalty by electricity, in concluding a supplementary report giving the results of the recent experiments made with the electric current upon animals, say: If any doubt should exist in the minds of some that electricity would not necessarily be fatal to man because it has been successfully applied to lower animals, we have but to call attention to the fact that since 1883 some 200 persons have been killed, as we are credibly informed, by the handling of electric-lighting wires. As most of these people were killed probably by contact of the hands with the wires it shows that in man at least death is rapid in this manner. Hence the suggestions made to this committee as to the use of wristlet electrodes have their value; and it is possible that this method, with the prisoner fastened in a chair, may ultimately prove the most desirable, as doing away with a complication of appliances and lending greater simplicity to the procedure.

AT a recent meeting of the Agricultural Society of France, M. Guerin, of Grandvilles (Vosges), read a paper on a new method of preserving milk. He showed that when it was frozen, milk could be transported with the greatest ease, and that after being kept for days and weeks, and then simply thawed out, it retained all the characteristics of fresh milk. The paper dealt first with the method of freezing, which could be carried out in the ordinary ice machines if done on a sufficiently large scale, and then described the experiments made to ascertain the precise temperature at which the best results might be expected. The appearance and taste of the milk after undergoing the process, when thawed, were so exactly those of new milk that in an assemblage of twenty persons not one could perceive the slightest difference. In cooking, yield of cream, and every other respect, the frozen corresponded with quite new milk, and on the fourth day the cream was still excellent, which was not the case with that of the latter. Butter and cheese can be prepared from it quite as well as from new milk.

DR. MARY WALKER still retains an irresistible love for the old soldier. In passing through the corridors of the Washington Patent Office a few days since, her eye rested upon a watchman whose service had left its sad impression upon him in the ways of physical infirmity. Observing that the department had neglected providing a hassock for his feet, which came in contact with the cold, unfeeling tassellated marble floor, the doctor procured a rug from another quarter of the building and carried it, despite the remonstrances of those to whose room it pertained, to the battle wrecked veteran. Placing the contraband article beneath the hero's pedal extremities, the humanitarian doctor delivered a few off hand remarks on the subject of hygiene and wended her way. The soldier boy was still warming his plantigrades on the three-ply rug when last heard from. In this connection it may be stated that the doctor is somewhat indignant concerning a certain article published in a New York paper from which it is made to appear that she and a chief clerk in one of the department bureaus are twins. The doctor insists that she not only is not now twin but never has been, and furthermore, by reason of her uniqueness, has never deigned to project her "double."

Perseverance Pays.

Mrs. Plentypop—Well, have you succeeded in getting rid of the attentions of Mr. Nevership?

Mrs. Widowfair—Hardly.

Mrs. P.—Did you have him arrested and fined for malicious persecution, as I advised you?

Mrs. W.—Yes.

Mrs. P.—With what result?

Mrs. W.—He paid the fine and came immediately to my house to renew his suit.

Mrs. P.—Well?

Mrs. W.—I had the footman kick him down the steps.

Mrs. P.—What then?

Mrs. W.—He apologized to James for wearing thick trousers, and said that he would call again.

Mrs. P.—Did he?

Mrs. W.—Yes, in ten minutes. I had to see him, of course.

Mrs. P.—And you upbraided him for his ungentlemanly conduct?

Mrs. W.—No. I began to suspect that the poor man really did love me, and love is such a rare quality in a man with an income of $100,000 a year that I—

Mrs. P.—You what?

Mrs. W.—I told him if he could wait till my sorrow was six weeks old, I would put him in a position for discharging James.

The Cause of Earthquakes.

At a recent meeting of the Manchester Geological Society, Mr. Thomas Oldham read a paper on "The Cause of Earthquakes, of Dislocation and Overlapping of Strata, and of Similar Phenomena." From that address we copy the following

"Astronomers tell us that the deviation of the earth's axis arrives at its maximum every 39,000 years, so that consequently the south pole, when the climax occurs, would occupy the place where the north pole is now."

A French astronomer says the world upsets every 38,000 years. When it upsets it does so speedily, sending rocks, icebergs and glaciers flying with fearful velocity from one pole toward the other.

A Dreadful Scandal.

On Commonwealth avenue

"Did you hear that awful thing that Mr. Deucace said about Mrs. Klownie?" asked one lady in the group, and then, answering her own question, went on, "He said she was the most unfortunate woman at whist; she never held a trump." "But," said a listener, "she must hold a trump when she deals!" And then Deuce-ace said, "She never deals—she misdeals."—Boston Commercial Bulletin.

WARNER'S Safe Cure removes defective vision or sight. Why? Because it gets rid of the poisonous kidney acid circulating in the blood. Impaired vision is caused by advanced kidney disease, another name for Bright's disease, which "has no symptom of its own." Warner's Safe Cure removes the cause, when normal vision returns.

THE OUNCE OF PREVENTION.

Under the above heading the New York World of February 10th contains an editorial, of which the following are a few extracts:

Physicians and unprofessional men of sense agree that if people would take a little of the pains to prevent disease that they do to have it cured that the civilized world would be much less like a vast hospital than it is now. * * * * But the idea of a regular and stated physical examination, even of persons who are apparently well, is an excellent one. The approaches of pulmonary complaints, kidney troubles and many of the other ills that the flesh is heir to are so insidious as not to be apparent to their victim. * * * * In nothing is it truer than in disease that 'an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure.'"

There is a great deal of wisdom in what the World remarks. Individuals, as a rule, do not give their physical welfare attention, and it is only when alarmed by the presence of disease itself—the consciousness of failing strength—that attention is given to such matters.

Much has been said and written in recent years concerning the extreme and oftentimes fatal danger which results from delay in the treatment of kidney diseases.

Physicians admit that they cannot control advanced disease in those organs, and it is doubtful whether they can control it in any stage without the assistance of Warner's Safe Cure, which is established as the only known means which will reliably prevent and cure this class of disease.

Besides, it has been definitely ascertained that kidney disease is the real cause of ill health in most cases where consumption, heart, brain or nervous disorders are supposed to exist, and in consequence of such belief many fatal mistakes have been committed by our best physicians in treating such disorders, which are but the symptoms of the disease, whilst they have allowed the real disease—disease of the kidneys, to escape their notice until too late.

There is no safer or surer way by which health can be preserved and disease averted than by the occasional use of Warner's Safe Cure, which will benefit the "engines of life"—the kidneys, even if they are in a normally healthy state, while the good that will result in case disease is threatened, or is already present, cannot be overestimated.

Utilizing a Girl Who Was Willing to be Sister.

"No, Mr. Jackson, I cannot be your wife, as my heart is already in the keeping of another, but I can be a sister to you."

"Oh, 'tis hard to be thus obliged to give you up, Maud, and still your very generous offer to be a sister to me cannot go unaccepted. Will you be as near a real sister to me as possible?"

"Yes, George, I shall endeavor to."

"There is Jack Fourinhand's sister, for instance. Will you be as loving and attentive to me as she is to him?"

"With all my heart, George."

"Very well, then sister mine, I shall try to be worthy—ah, I really must be going, though—good night, sister."

The next day Miss Maud received a package, and upon opening it discovered that it contained—horrors!—two pairs of trousers, six pairs of socks and a shirt. A note slipped out, and upon reading it this is what she saw

Dear Sister Maud.—I ascertained from Jack Fourinhand that his sister was in the habit of doing all of his mending. Thinking of our agreement I bethought me of these few articles of wearing apparel, which are sadly in need of buttons and mending. I have long needed a sister that would look after my clothes, and since you have so kindly consented to act in that capacity you may commence your duties at once.—Your loving brother, GEORGE.

He was the Emperor.

The other day the Emperor William of Germany, busied in his own room heard a violent disturbance in the nursery, and speedily made his way to the scene of tumult. When he entered the Crown Prince and Prince Eitel drew themselves up, and saluted their father in the military fashion, as is their wont. "What is all this noise about?" asked the Emperor. "A slight dispute, sire," said his eldest son, "and I was obliged to let my brother know who is Crown Prince in this establishment." "Good," said His Majesty. "I see what you mean, and now I think it will be as well if I let you know in the same way who is Emperor in this particular family!" and he forthwith administered a punishment which impressed itself on the mind and also on the body of the Crown Prince in a manner highly suggestive of the possibilities of the situation.

She May Find It.

She had called upon a real estate man to see if he had a house to suit her, and had gone over the list and found fault with everything. A little out of patience, he finally asked:

"What kind of a house do you want, anyhow?"

"It isn't the house so much as the neighborhood," she replied. "I want a location where the neighbors will be neighborly. If I want to give a party and want to borrow a piano, sofa, a few chairs, three or four pictures and some statuary, I want to feel that my neighbors will lend me with cheerfulness."

A revivalist at Tama, Ia., recently asked all of the congregation who paid their debts to rise. All rose but an editor, who explained that he didn't pay his debts because the rest of the congregation owed him on subscriptions.

ROMANCE OF GRETNA GREEN.

Crossing the Scotch Border in Haste to Marry.

Gretna Green was said to be "killed" by the Act of 1856, and as a place where elopements were legalized no doubt its glories have departed, says a London journal. The legality of Scotch marriages, however, still survives. Any person residing in Scotland three weeks can get married after the informal Scotch manner, and the marriage will hold good. In fact, elopements might still be conducted in a circuitous fashion. The gentleman could go first, reside at Gretna Green for three weeks, then be joined by his bride, and marry her on the spot. Other things, however, have put an end to this form of romantic marriage. In the days of posting the eloping lovers had every advantage. The young gentleman could arrange before hand for relays of horses; the pursuing sire could not do so, not knowing the date of the preparations for flight. Then it was said that the innkeepers and postboys always favored the fugitives. If the fathers generally overtook the runaways, it would have been bad for trade therefore the old gentleman did not always secure the freshest or best steeds, and it was surprising how often his postboys found a linchpin loose. Again and again was the rattle of the parson's coach heard when the knot was securely tied but not until then. Nowadays there are no coaches, but express trains, and the telegraph wires could anticipate the lovers and possibly secure delay if not detention. Also marriages in England have been made so easy that there are Gretna Greens at our very doors. Three weeks notice to a registrar and a quarter of an hour's absence from home will bring about a marriage without any one being the wiser—above all, not the man and woman who are wed. In London and large cities also the calling of banns at a parish church is very insufficient publicity when so many families attend favorite preachers elsewhere, and may never hear that their Mary or Ethel or Constance is about to marry in three weeks "that impecunious young Brown. Thus Gretna Green still virtually lingers with us. Magnetic attraction of something wise forces young girls, otherwise intelligent, attractive and even intellectual, to fix all the love of their young hearts on the wrong man. Fathers threaten, mothers weep, brothers call him names, or prove him to be everything that is insufferable or even bad; she will not listen or refuses to believe. One day the street door is open and she leaves her father's house to fix her own destiny—perhaps to love him always, in spite of all his faults or even vices—or to repent once, and that for life. So Gretna Green, or what it once signified, lives forever in human hearts.

Gus—I hear George has married an heiress. He's in clover now, I suppose?

Dick—No, he's working like a horse, trying to pay his board at a $40 a week hotel. Her father pays hers, and she won't live anywhere else.

"When I Was a Boy"

is an expression almost every lad has heard his father use as a basis for bombastic self adulation. Mr. Wm. Moore, of Varney, has a stack of hay out in the field and the other day on visiting it, he was surprised to discover that some one had been helping themselves off the stack. Suspicion points very strongly towards certain parties, but the evidence is scarcely sufficient to secure a conviction.—Grey Review.

Spring Effervescence.

The Stayner Sun prints a beautiful (sicem) "Vernal" poem. The perpetrator says that Couldst thou thy passing charms delay,

Or be thyself for ever free,
Could youth and springtime ever stay,
And cares and sorrows flee away,
Then paradise ing it reappear.

You bet it might, "Sunny." It might reappear for less than that and we would never say it nay. "Could youth and springtime ever stay" such men as "sunny" would be the first to kick and raise their voice in a horrible wail for the season of fall rains and ripe apples. It makes us sick to hear all the gush (slushy gush) written about beautiful spring. Of course spring is nice, but the human race are not all poets. Everybody cannot bask in the rays of gentle spring with a clear conscience. If humanity couldn't mop its face and groan about the heat, button up its overcoat and indulge in wintry blasts, or suffer the tortures of a thorough soaking with conglomerated rain and hail, it would die of inertia. These are all necessary concomitants of a vigorous constitution, and only the effeminate spring poet can exist without them.

Looking at the matter from an editor's standpoint [illegible] worst [illegible] Spring poem is a general nuisance. [illegible] The lambkins may frisk their tails and play hide and seek among the hollows, the gentle jay may fight the English sparrow in the sour apple tree, where the blossoms cling in odorous clusters, and the warm sun awake dormant poetic energy, but the only consolations brought to the poor editor at this season of the year are spring colds and a depleted pocket book. Out with the spring poet! Hustle him into oblivion, so that the practical editor may receive no reminder of days when the bells of New Year rang forth their bank falls chime. He ought to die.
